INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

Avec l'arrivée de 1950, «une attitude d'optimisme circonspect n'était pas exclue»[1]. Après avoir essuyé une série de revers en Europe orientale et en Asie à la fin des années 1940, les démocraties occidentales semblaient progresser de façon soutenue dans leurs efforts en vue de contenir le communisme, même s'il n'y avait pas de percées spectaculaires. Au début de 1950, le Canada et ses alliés de l'Atlantique Nord ont fait un premier pas à cet égard en contrôlant les exportations destinées au bloc soviétique, en fournissant une aide militaire à l'Europe occidentale et en déterminant les besoins de défense des pays de l'Atlantique Nord. Ils entreprirent en outre de redéfinir les liens économiques entre l'Europe et l'Amérique du Nord. Au début du printemps de 1950, le discours tenu par le Canada reflétait le regain de confiance du pays. «Les mesures prises en vue de l'application du Traité de l'Atlantique Nord, affirma en mars le ministre de la Défense nationale, Brooke Claxton, [...] ont rendu plus improbable une agression militaire et ont raffermi la confiance de l'Europe occidentale quant à la possibilité de prévenir l'agression par une action collective.»[2]

L'apparente diminution de la menace soviétique en Europe occidentale permit aux décideurs canadiens de tourner leur attention vers l'Asie, où la décolonisation, le sous-développement économique et le communisme étaient en train de créer une situation à la fois instable et dangereuse. Au début de la nouvelle année, le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, Lester B. Pearson, accompagné d'une poignée de conseillers, grimpa à bord d'un North Star de la RCAF pour le long voyage qui le mènerait à Ceylan, où se tenait une réunion des ministres des Affaires étrangères du Commonwealth. Cette conférence et ses suites, que le présent ouvrage documente avec force détails (Chapitre 7), eurent d'importantes répercussions sur la politique étrangère du Canada. Elles vinrent renforcer la perspective de plus en plus multilatérale du gouvernement fédéral quant aux affaires du Commonwealth et lui confirmèrent que la Grande-Bretagne présentait de moins en moins d'attrait comme point d'ancrage de cette association historique. En proposant pour la première fois de transférer du capital au monde en développement par l'entremise de ce qui allait devenir le Plan de Colombo pour le développement économique coopératif de l'Asie du Sud et du Sud-Est, ces discussions du Commonwealth amenèrent un Cabinet canadien jusque-là hésitant et réticent à reconnaître que le problème de la pauvreté dans le monde était aussi le problème du Canada.

Fait plus important encore, le voyage du ministre à Ceylan et sa tournée subséquente en Asie ajoutèrent une dimension extrême-orientale à la politique étrangère canadienne. Que les relations indo-canadiennes aient été particulièrement étroites ou non durant cette période[3], il ne fait guère de doute que l'exposition de Pearson au premier ministre de l'Inde, Jawaharlal Nehru, a eu un impact profond sur les opinions de ce Canadien. Pearson, qui décrira plus tard Nehru comme «une combinaison extraordinaire du mystique hindou ... et de l'Anglais du type Eton-

INTRODUCTION

As 1950 opened, there were "grounds for cautious optimism."[1] After the series of reverses suffered in eastern Europe and Asia during the late 1940s, the Western democracies seemed at last to be making steady, if unspectacular progress, towards containing Communism. Canada and its North Atlantic allies made a moderate start in early 1950 on controlling exports to the Soviet bloc, on providing military aid to Western Europe and on determining North Atlantic defence requirements. Moreover, they began to re-define the economic relationship that united Europe and North America. By the early spring of 1950, Canadian rhetoric reflected the country's renewed confidence. "The steps taken to implement the North Atlantic treaty," the Minister of National Defence, Brooke Claxton, asserted in March, "... have increased the improbability of military aggression and strengthened the faith of the western European nations in the possibility of preventing aggression by collective action."[2]

The apparent diminution of the Soviet threat in Western Europe allowed Canadian policy-makers to turn their attention to Asia, where decolonization, economic under-development and Communism were beginning to prove an unstable and dangerous mixture. Early in the new year, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Lester B. Pearson, with a handful of advisors, climbed the wobbly steps of an RCAF North Star for the lengthy voyage to Ceylon for a meeting of Commonwealth foreign ministers. This conference and its aftermath, which this volume documents in considerable detail (Chapter 7), had important implications for Canadian foreign policy. It reinforced Ottawa's increasingly multilateral perspective on Commonwealth affairs and underlined Great Britain's waning attraction for the Canadian government as the centre of this historic association. In pioneering the transfer of Western capital to the developing world through what eventually became the Colombo Plan for Co-operative Economic Development in South and South-East Asia, these Commonwealth discussions drew from a hesitant and reluctant Canadian Cabinet the acknowledgement that the problem of world poverty was Canada's problem too.

More important, the Minister's trip to Ceylon and his subsequent tour through Asia added a Far Eastern orientation to Canadian foreign policy. Whether or not Indo-Canadian relations were especially close during this period,[3] there is little doubt that Pearson's exposure to the Indian Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, had a profound impact on the Canadian's thinking. Pearson, who later described Nehru as "an extraordinary combination of a Hindu mystic ... and an Eton-Oxbridge type of Englishman,"[4] was never entirely comfortable with the Indian premier, but he listened carefully to his views on Asian issues. As a result, Canadian policy towards Indochina (Chapter 11), Kashmir (Chapter 3) and China (Chapter 11) bore the unmistakable imprint of Nehru's influence. Canada's attempt to understand and respond to Asia as it became a new arena for Cold War conflict forms one of the major themes of this volume.

Oxbridge»[4], ne se sentit jamais vraiment à l'aise avec le premier ministre de l'Inde, mais il ne prêta pas moins une oreille attentive à ses opinions sur les questions asiatiques. C'est ainsi que la politique canadienne à l'égard de l'Indochine (Chapitre 11), du Cachemire (Chapitre 3) et de la Chine (Chapitre 11) porta incontestablement l'empreinte de l'influence de Nehru. Les efforts faits par le Canada pour comprendre l'Asie et répondre aux attentes d'une région qui devenait un nouveau théâtre du conflit de la guerre froide, sont l'un des grands thèmes du présent volume.

Durant les premiers mois de 1950 également, l'onde de choc des révolutions en Asie fit sentir son effet. La décision de l'Union soviétique de boycotter les travaux de l'Organisation des Nations Unies (ONU) tant et aussi longtemps que le Conseil de sécurité refuserait d'assigner au nouveau gouvernement communiste le «siège de la Chine» créa une impasse dangereuse. Aux États-Unis, l'effondrement de la Chine nationaliste produisit une vague d'hystérie nationale qui devint de plus en plus virulente avec le lancement, par le sénateur Eugene McCarthy, de sa chasse aux communistes au sein du gouvernement. Les contacts, même routiniers, entre l'Est et l'Ouest n'étant plus possibles à l'hiver et au printemps de 1950, Pearson chercha à freiner la glissade vers l'affrontement. Ses efforts de médiation et ses vues sur l'aggravation de la crise internationale sont documentés dans un fascinant échange de lettres et de notes avec son proche ami, Hume Wrong, l'ambassadeur du Canada aux États-Unis. (Documents 224-231).

Du point de vue occidental, au moins l'une des conséquences du boycott soviétique fut fortuite : lorsque la Corée du Nord envahit son voisin au sud le matin du 25 juin, l'absence de l'Union soviétique au Conseil de sécurité permit aux États-Unis d'amener l'ONU à agir. Convaincu que l'attaque était un défi lancé, à l'instigation de l'Union soviétique, à l'ONU dont le prestige et l'autorité étaient déjà sapés par l'incapacité de l'Organisation de riposter à l'agression communiste à la fin des années 1940, le gouvernement canadien se rallia à la coalition internationale après une série de longues et âpres discussions au Cabinet. À une époque où la puissance économique et militaire du Canada était comparativement significative, la réaction du gouvernement à la crise était d'une grande importance à la fois pour les Canadiens et pour leurs alliés. Cette réaction fut particulièrement révélatrice de l'attitude des décideurs canadiens à propos du rôle de leur pays dans la guerre froide, et des relations du Canada avec ses principaux alliés et avec l'ONU. À chaque stade du conflit, la volonté du Canada d'être une influence modératrice au sein de l'alliance occidentale se précisait[5]. C'est donc ce qui explique qu'un bon quart du présent volume documente l'engagement du Canada dans les stades préliminaires de la guerre et les efforts déployés subséquemment par Ottawa pour trouver une base sur laquelle asseoir la paix.

The early months of 1950 also carried the turmoil of revolutionary Asia uncomfortably close to home. The Soviet Union's decision to boycott the United Nations as long as the Security Council refused to assign the "China seat" to the new Communist government led to dangerous deadlock. In the United States, the collapse of Nationalist China produced an unsettling wave of national hysteria that grew increasingly virulent as Senator Eugene McCarthy launched his campaign against "Communists in government." As even routine contacts between East and West ground to a halt in the winter and spring of 1950, Pearson tried to curb the drift towards confrontation. His efforts at mediation and his views on the deepening international crisis are documented in a compelling exchange of letters and memoranda with his close friend, Hume Wrong, Canada's ambassador to the United States. (Documents 224-231).

From the Western perspective, at least one result of the Soviet boycott was fortuitous: when North Korea invaded its southern neighbour on the morning of June 25, the Soviet Union's absence from the Security Council allowed the United States to lead the United Nations into action. Convinced that the attack was a Soviet-inspired challenge to the United Nations, whose prestige and authority were already ravaged by its inability to respond to Communist aggression in the late 1940s, Ottawa joined the international coalition after a series of lengthy and heated Cabinet discussions. At a time when Canada's economic and military strength was comparatively substantial, its reaction to this crisis mattered a great deal to both Canadians and their allies. This response revealed much about the attitudes of Canadian policy-makers to the country's role in the Cold War, and its relations with its principal allies and with the United Nations. As each successive stage of the conflict unfolded, Canada's attempt to be a moderating influence in the Western alliance became more sharply defined.[5] With good reason, then, fully one-quarter of this volume documents Canada's involvement in the opening stages of the war and Ottawa's subsequent efforts to find a basis for peace.

While Korea is at the heart of only one chapter (Chapter 2), documentation on the crisis and its influence on Canadian policy is necessarily scattered throughout the entire volume. The war swept away the careful optimism that characterized Ottawa's international outlook during the first few months of the year. In a single stroke, the conflict transformed the Cold War from a tense but fairly stable diplomatic stand-off into a much more precarious and dangerous confrontation. It altered completely the context in which Canadian foreign policy was developed and implemented. The effects of the conflict in Asia, for example, dominated Canadian preparations for the UN's 5th General Assembly and forced the international organization to debate the status of Formosa and the nature of collective security (Chapter 3). The conflict also provided new impetus for proceeding with the long-delayed Japanese Peace Treaty (Chapter 11), determined Canada's attitude towards the International Red Cross (Chapter 4), and influenced the Commonwealth discussions on capital assistance (Document 7).

Si la Corée n'est le sujet central que de l'un des chapitres (Chapitre 2), la documentation sur la crise et son influence sur la politique canadienne est forcément disséminée dans l'ensemble du volume. Le conflit balaya l'optimisme prudent qui avait caractérisé la perspective internationale du gouvernement canadien durant les premiers mois de l'année. Abruptement, il transforma la guerre froide — jusque-là une impasse diplomatique tendue mais plutôt stable — en un affrontement beaucoup plus précaire et dangereux. Il redéfinit complètement le contexte qui présidait à l'élaboration et à l'application de la politique étrangère du Canada. Les effets du conflit en Asie, par exemple, dominèrent les préparatifs du Canada à la 5e Assemblée générale de l'ONU et ils contraignirent l'Organisation à débattre le statut de Formose et la nature de la sécurité collective (Chapitre 3). Le conflit incita aussi à aller de l'avant avec la conclusion, longtemps reportée, du Traité de paix avec le Japon (Chapitre 11), il façonna l'attitude du Canada à l'égard de la Croix-Rouge internationale (Chapitre 4) et il influa sur les discussions du Commonwealth relatives à l'aide financière (Chapitre 7).

Mais ce fut peut-être au niveau de l'attitude du Canada vis-à-vis de ses obligations dans le cadre du Traité de l'Atlantique Nord (Chapitre 5) et de ses relations avec les États-Unis (Chapitre 8) que le conflit en Corée eut son impact le plus grand. Il fit naître la crainte d'une offensive soviétique imminente en Europe occidentale et il mit un terme à la répugnance traditionnelle d'Ottawa à investir ses maigres ressources dans la préparation militaire en temps de paix. En juillet et en août, les pressions américaines réussirent à convaincre le Cabinet d'accroître substantiellement les dépenses de défense. Tandis que l'Amérique du Nord et l'Europe s'empressaient de se réarmer, les efforts du Canada pour fournir une aide mutuelle à ses alliés de l'Atlantique Nord, de timides qu'ils étaient au début de 1950, se transformèrent en un énorme programme de 300 millions de dollars. Alors que la nouvelle alliance était déjà divisée sur la question de réarmer l'Allemagne de l'Ouest, le gouvernement canadien acceptait en septembre 1950 de renvoyer des troupes en Europe dans le cadre de la nouvelle force intégrée de l'Atlantique Nord. Comme John Holmes le rappellera plus tard, «pour ceux qui pensaient que la participation aux institutions internationales allait se faire à peu de frais, 1950 fut une mauvaise année.»[6]

On devrait aussi lire la plupart des documents sur les relations du Canada avec les États-Unis en gardant à l'esprit le conflit coréen et ses ramifications. Si le chapitre 8 s'attarde quelque peu à des questions traditionnelles de «voisinage» comme le Traité concernant la dérivation des eaux du Niagara et la gestion des pêches, il accorde une place importante à l'examen de questions de défense bilatérales qui, après juin 1950, occupèrent l'avant-scène. Les négociations difficiles et embarrassantes sur les achats de matériel de défense au début de 1950 contrastent nettement avec le rythme rapide de l'intégration militaire et économique qui s'enclencha quand les États-Unis — et le Canada qui fut forcé d'emboîter le pas — amorcèrent une mobilisation partielle à l'automne de la même année.

[6] John Holmes, The Shaping of Peace: Canada and the Search for World Order, 1943-1957, Volume 2 (Toronto, University of Toronto Press, 1982), p. 176.

The Korean conflict had perhaps its greatest impact on Canada's attitude towards its North Atlantic Treaty obligations (Chapter 5) and its relations with the United States (Chapter 8). It gave rise to the fear that a Soviet offensive in Western Europe was imminent and ended Ottawa's traditional reluctance to invest its scarce resources in peace-time military preparedness. In July and August, American pressure helped convince the Cabinet to increase Canadian defence expenditures substantially. As North America and Western Europe hurried to rearm, Canada's efforts to supply its North Atlantic allies with mutual aid — diffident in early 1950 — became an enormous $300-million program. By September 1950, with the new alliance already straining under the weight of the crisis over the decision to re-arm West Germany, the government agreed to send Canadian troops back to Europe as part of the new North Atlantic integrated force. "For those who assumed that participation in international institutions was going to be cheap," John Holmes recalled later, "1950 was a bad year."[6]

Most of the material on Canada's relations with the United States should also be read with one eye on the conflict in Korea and its wide-ranging consequences. While Chapter 8 devotes some attention to such traditional "fence-line" issues as the Niagara Diversion Treaty and fisheries management, substantial space is given over to the consideration of bilateral defence questions, which loomed larger than ever after June 1950. The difficult and awkward negotiations over defence procurement in early 1950 contrast strikingly with the rapid pace of military and economic integration that resulted when the United States — with Canada forced to follow closely behind — moved towards partial mobilization in the fall of 1950.

The new sense of urgency which infused Canada's defence relations with the United States propelled the government's concern for Canadian sovereignty to new heights. Washington's inclination to view its neighbour's northern reaches as increasingly vital for the defence of North America led to a growing requirement for bases and facilities. In acceding to the U.S. request to station a squadron of nuclear-armed B-49s at Goose Bay in August 1950, Canada was confronted for the first time with troubling questions about its role and responsibilities in any American decision to deploy nuclear weapons from Canadian territory. This issue complicated bilateral relations for the rest of the decade.

As the Cold War entered a chillier period, other bilateral relationships paled in significance compared with the importance of Canada's relations with the United States. Indeed, the unexpected expenditures necessitated by the Korean crisis prompted Ottawa to suspend plans for opening new posts abroad, accounting for the brevity of the first chapter. Instead of the usual collection of documents on recognition and accreditation, this section has as its central preoccupation the impact of the Cold War on the conduct of diplomacy.

Similarly, the Cold War effectively eliminated significant bilateral exchanges with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe (Chapter 10). Isolated in his chancery, Canada's chargé d'affaires, John Watkins, even found it impossible to comment meaningfully on the nature and course of Soviet foreign policy. Relations with the Le nouveau sentiment d'urgence qui caractérisa les relations de défense du Canada avec les États-Unis aviva comme jamais auparavant les préoccupations du gouvernement au sujet de la souveraineté canadienne. La propension de Washington à considérer que les territoires nordiques de son voisin avaient un rôle de plus en plus vital dans la défense de l'Amérique du Nord conduisit à une demande accrue de bases et d'installations militaires. Lorsqu'il accepta le stationnement d'un escadron américain de B-49 équipés d'armes nucléaires à Goose Bay en août 1950, le Canada dut pour la première fois faire face à des questions troublantes au sujet de son rôle et de ses responsabilités à l'égard de toute décision américaine de déployer des armes nucléaires à partir du territoire canadien. Ce dilemme compliqua les relations bilatérales durant le reste de la décennie.

Avec l'aggravation de la guerre froide, les autres relations bilatérales du Canada subirent un net recul par rapport aux liens avec les États-Unis. D'ailleurs, les dépenses inattendues qu'entraîna la crise coréenne amenèrent Ottawa à suspendre l'ouverture de nouvelles missions à l'étranger, ce qui explique la brièveté du premier chapitre. À la différence de la collection habituelle de documents sur la reconnaissance et l'accréditation, cette section privilégie l'impact de la guerre froide sur la conduite de la diplomatie.

De façon semblable, la guerre froide a effectivement éliminé tout échange bilatéral significatif avec l'Union soviétique et l'Europe orientale (Chapitre 10). Isolé dans sa chancellerie, le chargé d'affaires du Canada, John Watkins, se rendit compte qu'il lui était impossible de faire une analyse pertinente de la nature et de l'orientation de la politique étrangère soviétique. Les relations avec le bloc soviétique se résumèrent essentiellement à des échanges de propagande. Ailleurs en Europe orientale, l'intensification de la guerre froide obligea le gouvernement canadien à examiner quelle serait sa position face à une Allemagne divisée en permanence et à l'État communiste dissident de la Yougoslavie. À l'hiver de 1950-1951, quand les tensions qui divisaient l'Est et l'Ouest atteignirent leur paroxysme, des hauts fonctionnaires et des ministres cherchèrent à mesurer les risques très réels d'une guerre dans une série de mémoires passant en revue une année qui s'achevait «sur une crise et des espoirs déçus»[7] (Documents 629 à 636).

Les rapports personnels, politiques et administratifs qui avaient façonné la politique canadienne en 1949 restèrent largement inchangés[8]. Au sommet, le premier ministre, Louis Saint-Laurent, continua sa collaboration harmonieuse avec Pearson, qui acquérait de plus en plus de maîtrise et de confiance dans ses fonctions de secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures. Comme l'illustrent cependant les sections sur la reconnaissance de la Chine communiste et les débuts du conflit coréen, les deux hommes divergèrent parfois dans leur façon d'aborder des aspects de la guerre froide. Pearson, toujours relativement inexpérimenté comme ministre, fut parfois enclin à négliger les considérations de politique intérieure alors qu'il cherchait à réaliser ses objectifs en matière de politique étrangère. D'autre part, le premier ministre, formé par un William Lyon Mackenzie King prudent, était extrêmement conscient de la nécessité de ne pas s'écarter de l'opinion canadienne.

Soviet bloc were virtually reduced to an exchange of propaganda. Elsewhere in Eastern Europe, the hardening of the Cold War compelled the Canadian government to consider how it might deal with a permanently divided Germany and the dissident Communist state of Yugoslavia. As the tensions dividing East and West reached their most acute phase in the winter of 1950-51, senior officials and cabinet ministers tried to assess the very real possibility of war in a series of memoranda that surveyed a year which ended "in crisis and in disappointed hopes."[7] (Documents 629 to 636)

The personal, political and bureaucratic relationships that had shaped Canadian policy in 1949 remained largely unaltered.[8] At the top, the Prime Minister, Louis St. Laurent, continued to work smoothly with his increasingly sure-footed and self-confident Secretary of State for External Affairs. However, as the sections dealing with the recognition of Communist China and the early stages of the Korean conflict make clear, occasional differences emerged in the way they approached Cold War issues. Pearson, who was still relatively inexperienced as a Cabinet minister, was sometimes inclined to overlook domestic considerations in pursuit of his foreign policy objectives. On the other hand, the Prime Minister, tutored by the cautious William Lyon Mackenzie King, was acutely aware of the need to proceed in step with domestic opinion.

Arnold Heeney continued to serve as the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. Among his senior associates, the only significant change involved the rotation of Charles Ritchie from Paris to Ottawa, where he joined H.O. Moran and Léon Mayrand as one of the department's three assistant under-secretaries of state for external affairs. Ritchie was primarily responsible for European affairs.

There were no changes in leadership at Canada's most important posts: Hume Wrong remained in Washington, Dana Wilgress in London, and Georges Vanier in Paris. Nevertheless, there were a few notable developments in Canada's representation abroad. G.A. Riddell became the Permanent Representative to the United Nations in August 1950, displacing John Holmes, who had served in an acting capacity for most of the year. At the same time, Sidney Pierce, the Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, was sent to head the new mission to the Organization for European Economic Co-operation.

The records of the Department of External Affairs and the Privy Council Office provided most of the material for this survey of Canadian foreign policy. They were supplemented where necessary by the personal papers of many of the Cabinet ministers and senior officials involved in these events and by the records of the departments of Defence, Trade and Commerce, and Finance. In preparing this volume, I was given complete access to the records of the Department of External Affairs and generous access to other collections. A complete list of the sources examined in the preparation of this volume may be found on page xxiii.

The selection of documents has been guided by the principles set out in the Introduction to Volume 7 (pp. ix-xi) of this series. The editorial devices used in this Arnold Heeney resta sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures. Le seul changement important parmi ses proches collaborateurs fut le retour de Paris de Charles Ritchie, qui se joignit à H.O. Moran et à Léon Mayrand comme sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint, avec pour responsabilité principale les affaires européennes.

Il n'y eut aucun changement à la tête des plus importantes missions canadiennes : Hume Wrong resta à Washington, Dana Wilgress à Londres et Georges Vanier à Paris. La représentation du Canada à l'étranger connut néanmoins quelques modifications notables. G.A. Riddell devint le représentant permanent aux Nations Unies en août 1950, en remplacement de John Holmes, qui agissait à titre de représentant suppléant depuis le début de l'année. Sidney Pierce, le sous-ministre associé au ministère du Commerce, fut pour sa part nommé à la tête de la nouvelle mission auprès de l'Organisation européenne de coopération économique.

La plupart des documents utilisés dans ce survol de la politique étrangère du Canada proviennent des dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures et du Bureau du Conseil privé. J'ai aussi utilisé au besoin les documents personnels de différents ministres et hauts fonctionnaires qui participèrent à ces événements ainsi que les dossiers des ministères de la Défense nationale, du Commerce et des Finances. J'ai eu libre accès aux dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures et j'ai pu aussi consulter abondamment d'autres collections. La liste complète des sources examinées figure à la page xxiii.

Les principes directeurs suivis pour sélectionner les documents sont ceux exposés dans l'Introduction au volume 7 (pp. ix-xi). Les signes conventionnels de ce volume sont les mêmes que ceux décrits dans l'Introduction au volume 9 (p. xix). Une croix (†) signifie que le document n'a pas été imprimé; des points de suspension [...] indiquent une coupure dans le texte.

Le travail était déjà amorcé quand j'ai assumé la direction du présent ouvrage à l'automne de 1992. Je suis reconnaissant à Gaston Blanchet des travaux qu'il avait déjà effectués. Le personnel des Archives nationales du Canada a contribué à mener le projet à terme. Paulette Dozois, Paul Marsden et Dave Smith de la Sous-section des affaires militaires et internationales de la Division des archives gouvernementales ont toujours répondu à mes nombreuses demandes de façon rapide, utile et, surtout, avec gentillesse. Michael Way, de la Section de l'accès à l'information, et Janet Murray, au comptoir du prêt, n'ont pas ménagé d'efforts pour m'assurer un approvisionnement continu de documentation.

Chris Cook et Brian Hearnden m'ont bien secondé à titre d'adjoints à la recherche tout au cours du projet. Mon collègue Ted Kelly, qui m'a assisté dans la révision des chapitres sur la conduite de la diplomatie, l'aviation civile et les relations avec le bloc soviétique, m'a fourni un appui indispensable à tous les niveaux du projet, de sa conception à la publication. Angie Sauer a aidé à la sélection de documents sur l'Allemagne et Robert Bothwell a volontiers partagé sa connaissance du dossier de l'énergie atomique. Les anciens éditeurs Norman Hillmer, Hector Mackenzie et Don Barry ont toujours été disponibles pour discuter des problèmes auxquels j'ai été confronté et ils m'ont toujours offert des conseils sûrs et pratiques. L'éditeur en chef de la collection, John Hilliker, a revu l'ensemble du

The work on this volume had already begun when I assumed responsibility as editor in the fall of 1992. I am grateful for the early start made on this project by Gaston Blanchet. The staff at the National Archives of Canada was instrumental in bringing this project to completion. Paulette Dozois, Paul Marsden and Dave Smith of the Military and International Affairs Records Unit of the Government Archives Division consistently responded promptly, helpfully and, most important, cheerfully to my many inquiries. Michael Way, from the Access to Information Section, and Janet Murray at the circulation desk, both worked hard at keeping a steady supply of raw material flowing across my desk.

Chris Cook and Brian Hearnden served ably as research assistants throughout the enterprise. My colleague Ted Kelly, who helped edit the chapters on the conduct of diplomacy, civil aviation and relations with the Soviet bloc, provided indispensable assistance at all stages of the project from conception to publication. Angie Sauer helped with the selection of documents on Germany, and Robert Bothwell willingly contributed his knowledge on atomic energy. Former editors Norman Hillmer, Hector Mackenzie and Don Barry were always available to discuss the editorial challenges I faced and invariably offered sound and practical advice. The general editor of this series, John Hilliker, reviewed the entire manuscript with his usual attention to detail. His comments undoubtedly have made this a better book. The series would not be possible without the support I received from the two directors of the Corporate Communications Division under whom it prospered — Mary Jane Starr and Alan Darisse. Despite all this help, I remain responsible for the final selection of documents in this volume.

For the first time in many years, the Historical Section furnished the supplementary text and co-ordinated the technical preparation of the volume. The manuscript was typed and formatted by Aline Gélineau. Boris Stipernitz compiled the index and André Racicot of the department's translation bureau rendered into French the footnotes, captions and ancillary text. Gail Devlin, who proofread the entire manuscript, shared the insights garnered from her work on several earlier volumes. My work on this volume was helped in countless ways by the quiet support of Mary Donaghy and the vocal exhortations of Katherine Donaghy.

manuscrit avec son habituel souci du détail. Ses observations ont sans aucun doute amélioré l'ouvrage. La collection ne serait pas possible sans l'appui que j'ai reçu des deux directeurs de la Direction des communications ministérielles — Mary Jane Starr et Alan Darisse — qui en ont assuré l'essor. En dépit de toute cette aide, je reste responsable de la sélection finale des documents dans le présent ouvrage.

Pour la première fois depuis de nombreuses années, la Section historique a fourni les ajouts et a coordonné la préparation technique de l'ouvrage. Le manuscrit a été saisi et mis en forme par Aline Gélineau. Boris Stipernitz a établi l'index et André Racicot du Service de traduction du Ministère a traduit en français les notes de bas de page, les légendes et les ajouts. Gail Devlin, qui a fait la correction d'épreuves de l'ensemble du manuscrit, a partagé le fruit de l'expérience qu'elle avait acquise lors de la production de plusieurs ouvrages antérieurs. Le soutien discret de Mary Donaghy et les exhortations de Katherine Donaghy m'ont aussi aidé d'innombrables façons.

Le sous-ministre du Commerce

Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, June 6, 1950

Dear Mr. Heeney,

This Department is proposing to open an office in Colombo, Ceylon, before the end of the year. We have in the past directed our trade promotion activities in Ceylon from Bombay, but this has never been entirely satisfactory. Now that Ceylon has become a Dominion within the Commonwealth and is the only Dominion without a Canadian Government representative of any kind, trade direction from India is even less satisfactory.

While it is desirable to have an officer in Ceylon primarily concerned with trade promotion, his duties would not be so onerous that he could not take on other general responsibilities such as attending to passports, visas, etc., which you might wish to delegate to him, pending the establishment of a diplomatic mission in Colombo. It was my understanding, from our telephone conversation, that you were in agreement with this view and that it would be appropriate to accord some designation, other than Trade Commissioner, which would indicate the general character of this officer's functions. I should be glad to have your suggestions on this subject.

You may wish to advise the Government of Ceylon of our intentions, enquiring at the same time as to the privileges which they would be willing to accord such a representative.

The name of the proposed incumbent, together with his curriculum vitae, will be furnished later when the time approaches for the officer to actually take up his duties, and when official notification of his appointment to Ceylon will be requested.

Yours faithfully,
M.W. MACKENZIE

Mr. Howe telephoned me this morning about the appointment of a Trade and Commerce official to Ceylon. He said that they wished to appoint Mr. [Arthur Evan] Bryan, now in London, and to give him the title of "Commissioner" rather than "Trade Commissioner", so that he would be able to do whatever consular work was required. I told him that we thought Commissioner was the best title in the circumstances, but that we did not wish it to be understood by this appointment that Bryan was to become "our man", or a High Commissioner subsequently, if one was appointed on the political level. Mr. Howe said that they quite understood this and that Bryan would continue to be a Trade and Commerce official. I said that on this understanding, we had no objection to the appointment, and Mr. Howe indicated that they would be proceeding with it immediately.

LETTER NO. B-388 [Ottawa], September 18, 1950

APPOINTMENT OF A REPRESENTATIVE OF THE DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE IN CEYLON

Reference: My telegram No. 47 of June 26, 1950.†

The Ceylon Government informs us that it prefers the term "Trade Commissioner" to that of "Commissioner" because the term "Commissioner" is generally reserved for a representative of one country to another when the relation between the two countries is not one of equality. The Ceylon Government assures us that our representative as Trade Commissioner could exercise consular or even quasi-diplomatic functions in Ceylon, and states that a higher place is provided in the precedence table for Trade Commissioners who are the sole representatives in Ceylon of their respective Governments than for Trade Commissioners attached to diplomatic Missions.

2. In my above telegram I mentioned that it was proposed to appoint to Ceylon Mr. Arthur Evan Bryan. However, it has now been decided that Mr. Paul Sykes, until recently Trade Commissioner in Singapore, is to proceed within the next month or so to open a Trade Commissioner's Office in Colombo.[1]

3. Your despatch No. 249 of August 10, 1950,† reached the Department shortly after the above arrangements had been made. You will note that the designation of the representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce is entirely in agreement with the conversation you had with Sir Kandiah Vaithianathan on this subject.

CUBA

4. DEA/7590-P-40

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 14, 1950

ELEVATION OF LEGATIONS IN CANADA AND CUBA TO THE RANK OF EMBASSY

The Canadian Minister to Cuba[2] reported last October an informal approach by the Cuban Foreign Office with a view to raising the rank of the Canadian mission in Havana and the Cuban mission in Ottawa to the rank of embassy. This approach has followed approval by the Cuban Congress of the raising to the rank of embassy the Cuban missions in Canada, to the Holy See, and in Panama.

2. As you know, this proposal revives a suggestion made in 1947, when Mr. St. Laurent agreed that Mr. [Joseph Jacques Janvier Émile] Vaillancourt, then Canadian Minister to Cuba, might informally enquire whether the Cuban Government would agree to the raising of the missions to the rank of embassy. The two principal reasons in favour of our suggesting such a step were (a) our general policy to have diplomatic missions of uniform rank in the western hemisphere, and (b) the anomaly of having an embassy in a country like Peru, while we have a mission of lower status in Cuba where our commercial and other interests are more important. No definite response to our reciprocal proposal was received from the Cubans at that time, chiefly because of approaching presidential elections and because of the President's anticipated difficulty in obtaining the approval of the Cuban Congress. We were informed, however, that there would be no objection if Canada desired to proceed with the appointment of an ambassador in Havana.

[2] E.H. Coleman.

3. Owing to Mr. Vaillancourt's departure from Havana for Belgrade, the question was reconsidered in the Department. We were reluctant to take the initiative again, since at that time the United Kingdom, which only maintains a legation in Havana, was undertaking certain negotiations with the Cuban Government and did not wish to agree to the raising of their respective missions unless these negotiations were concluded in a manner satisfactory to the United Kingdom. We did not wish any action on our part to weaken any bargaining power which the United Kingdom might have had in their discussions. A further reason was that we ourselves were making important representations on the question of taxation of Canadian insurance companies and might have wished to make use of this step.

4. Now that we have been approached by the Cubans, the question has been given further consideration. At the present moment there seems no likelihood that further delay will assist either the United Kingdom or Canada in current negotiations with Cuba. The United Kingdom's discussions have reached a stalemate. One of the Canadian insurance companies — the Manufacturers' Life — has already received a bill for back taxes, but the new Minister of Finance is reported by both Dr. Coleman and the insurance companies concerned to be willing to adopt a more favourable attitude to our representations. I think that acceptance of the Cuban proposal at this time would certainly not prejudice our position in this question and might even to some extent contribute toward insuring a more equitable solution. I think that the same would apply to other fields such as telecommunications, where Cuba's cooperation is of importance to us. Moreover, Dr. Coleman has had informal conversations with the United Kingdom Minister and reports that in his opinion the proposed elevation of the Canadian mission would not have any adverse effect on United Kingdom-Cuban relations or on United Kingdom-Canadian relations in Cuba. He has also pointed out that in any event the Cuban Congress has not approved the raising of the Cuban mission in the United Kingdom. Finally, I think that, in view of our earlier initiative in the matter, it would be difficult to return a negative answer to this informal approach.

5. Accordingly I recommend that Dr. Coleman be instructed to inform the Cuban authorities that the Canadian Government accepts their proposal for the raising of the missions to the rank of embassy. However, as the United Kingdom legation in Havana for many years looked after Canadian interests in Cuba and United Kingdom consuls continue to perform certain consular services for us in various parts of Cuba, I suggest that we send advance notice to the United Kingdom, through the Canadian High Commissioner in London, of our intention.[3]

6. Since the departure of Dr. Brull,[4] the Cubans have not approached us regarding a successor. It is conceivable that they are awaiting a reply from us on this question before appointing either a Minister or an Ambassador, as these ranks in the Cuban foreign service are not interchangeable as in ours.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa], January 24, 1950

As instructed by Cabinet Minute of January 18,† I called in the Czechoslovak Chargé d'Affaires this afternoon in connection with the recent expulsion of two members of the Canadian Air Attaché's staff in Prague.

I outlined to Mr. Klima, who knew little or nothing about the whole matter, the incidents which had already taken place in which the locally engaged staff of our Legation had been arrested or prevented from working and have now led to the laying of unsupported charges against the two Canadian N.C.O.'s, Danko and Vanier. I informed Mr. Klima that I was instructed by the Government to say that the situation at our post in Prague was highly unsatisfactory. It was obviously impossible to conduct the legitimate business of the Legation under such conditions, which did not reflect relations between our two countries as we hoped them to be.

I went on to say that the Government wished an answer to the question as to whether or not it was the intention of the Czech Government by their interference with our staff to make it impossible for the Canadian Government to maintain diplomatic relations with the Government of Czechoslovakia. As to what steps the Government would be prepared to take with regard to the present situation, this would be a matter for further consideration.

Mr. Klima told me, what I did not know, that he was ordered to return to Prague some two weeks ago and was leaving next Tuesday. I asked him if he was returning to work with the Foreign Ministry and he rather carefully did not confirm this but said he was returning to Prague. He said, however, that he would telegraph at once to his Government for the required information. On his departure Mr. [Zdeněk] Roškot, Second Secretary, would be Chargé d'Affaires in Ottawa. Mr. Klima informed us that Mr. Roškot had been posted recently from Prague in order to take over the post after Mr. Klima's departure.

Dr. Mariano Brull, Minister of Legation of Cuba.

In answer to my question, Mr. Klima explained that the Czechoslovakian staff in Canada would now consist of a Second Secretary, a Commercial Attaché, with an Assistant, and a Consul General in Montreal, together with clerical staff locally employed.

It was my own impression and that of the two other officers of the Department who were present that Mr. Klima was intensely depressed by the whole affair and that he had been kept entirely in the dark about it.

Both the United Kingdom and the United States, not to mention other countries, have experienced an abundance of similar interference throughout the satellite countries. They have adopted a policy of retaliation. For example, last March, when Czechoslovakia demanded the immediate recall of a clerk in the United Kingdom Embassy on charges of espionage, the United Kingdom demanded the recall of the assistant to the Czech Commercial Attaché in London. Last October two employees of the American Embassy in Prague charged with espionage activities were requested to leave the country within twenty-four hours. The United States retaliated by requesting the withdrawal from the United States of the Czech Consul General in New York and of a member of the Czech Embassy in Washington.

I have arranged with the Chief of the Air Staff for the return of Sergeant Danko and Corporal Vanier to be expedited as much as possible, and for them to be interviewed by the C.A.S. and a senior officer of this Department on their arrival.

If, as I have no doubt, the charges against them turn out to be baseless, I would recommend that the Canadian Government demand the withdrawal, as persona non grata, of at least two members of the Czech staff in this country. Appropriate investigations have been made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the selection of the personnel to be withdrawn could be made on the basis of their findings.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS; INTERFERENCE WITH PERSONNEL OF CANADIAN LEGATION IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA

11. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of January 25th,† said that a detailed report had been received from the Chargé d'Affaires at Prague respecting the request of the Czech authorities for the immediate recall of Sergeant Danko and Corporal Vanier.

In view of the completely unwarranted interference by the Czech authorities with personnel of our Canadian Legation at Prague and as a retaliatory measure, it was recommended that a note be despatched immediately to the Czech Chargé d'Affaires at Ottawa designating Richard Berhmann, a bookkeeper at the Legation, and Hugo Behounak, an assistant clerk in the Commercial Attaché's office, as persona non grata and requiring their departure from Canada within seven days. If this course of action were approved, it was suggested that it be announced during the course of the regular External Affairs press conference to be held the following day.

12. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the Prime Minister's report on the recent expulsion of two members of the Canadian Legation at Prague and agreed that, as a retaliatory measure, a note† be despatched to the Chargé d'Affaires at Ottawa designating Richard Berhmann and Hugo Behounak as persona non grata and requiring their departure from Canada within seven days, these measures to be announced during the course of the regular External Affairs press conference to be held the following day.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], March 2, 1950

I attach a memorandum of February 28 which has been prepared by the European Division on the functions of Canadian diplomatic posts in Poland and Czechoslovakia. This memorandum is based on some discussions held in the Department. As an appendix there is attached a memorandum of February 28 by Mr. McCordick on the usefulness of Iron Curtain missions. His note gives an interesting first-hand estimate of the peculiar circumstances under which work is carried on at these missions.

NOTES ON FUNCTIONS OF CANADIAN POSTS IN POLAND AND CZECHOSLOVAKIA

It is evident that a concerted drive, probably part of a general Russian strategy, is under way in the satellite countries to make it difficult and even impossible for diplomatic missions from countries regarded as enemies, to function. This drive manifests itself in the arrest and false accusation of personnel of all ranks: in the linking of western diplomats, e.g., Mr. Heath,[5] to the 'crimes' fastened on the victims of political purges, thereby giving Communist governments grounds for blackening their reputation as diplomatic representatives: in the tightening of visa control, even for diplomats: in the intimidation of satellite nationals so as to discourage their having anything to do with westerners, their consuls, their newspapers, their radio, etc.

2. At the same time some journalists, business men, private travellers, correspondents from the west are either denied entry to or are driven out of these countries.

3. The net result is a growing atmosphere of fear, suspicion, frustration, and isolation in which the westerner simply has no place. He becomes in short an enemy alien.

4. The question therefore arises: has this atmosphere developed to a point at which the maintenance of our diplomatic missions no longer warrants its present cost to the public purse?

5. The political and diplomatic value of these posts resides in:

(a) The retention of one more connection between the countries and the western world. It can be assumed that Russia is trying to break all such connection;

(b) A point through which Canadian interests can be safeguarded (e.g. the legal and financial claims of Canadian citizens; the handling of the immigration of relatives of Canadians);

(c) Reports can be made on matters of direct and indirect interest to Canadians, and the Canadian Government; as e.g. the proceedings of Trade Union and other conferences: comments (usually insulting) on Canadian people and events: conditions inside the country such as resistance movements, religious persecution, economic developments: the evolution of Russian policy and strategy in the cold war: the form and effect of CBC broadcasts;

Donald R. Heath, Minister, United States Embassy in Bulgaria. Declared persona non grata January 19, 1950 for espionage in connection with the conviction and execution of Traicho Kostov, former Deputy Premier of Bulgaria.

(d) Above all, the importance of the curtain area as the combined laboratory and advanced area of Russian policy. If we assume, as we probably can, that the governments of Prague and Warsaw are to all intents and purposes the agents of the Kremlin, we have the opportunity, even under present restrictions, to study at close quarters the methods, immediate aims, and some of the weaknesses of the Moscow line. In the missions' functions this has the greatest potential usefulness, but to date we have fallen short in this sphere. These Missions also serve a military purpose in providing the Defence Departments with reports. By maintaining Service Attachés in Eastern Europe Canada makes a contribution to the Western cause which entitles her to benefit reciprocally from the prints of United Kingdom and United States Intelligence;

(e) Finally, as Canada is part of the Western alliance, we should maintain a common front with our Western friends and we should not want to withdraw our diplomatic missions from Eastern Europe without prior consultation with the United Kingdom and the United States.

The economic value would depend on:

(a) The requirements of other government departments; the Department of National Revenue, Customs Branch, recently enquired about price levels in Czechoslovakia in connection with the drawing up of Canadian tariff schedules;

(b) the potential markets in these countries for Canadian products;

(c) the economic significance of these countries in the Russian Economic Cominform;

(d) the military significance of production.

7. The Departmental value is to be formed chiefly in the unique training and experience provided for officers in the enemy camp. If we take a reasonably long view this will be of growing importance whether we move into a fighting war, or continue to exist as a vigilant antithesis to the Communist world.

8. If these are the potential uses of our curtain missions, how far are they being developed?

9. From Warsaw we get about two full political despatches a month: from Prague about the same. We also obtain numerous translations and clippings from Polish and Czech papers and periodicals. The subjects are varied, including the purges, trials, religious persecution, wage and price levels, reorganization of the national economy, occasional conversations with officials, resistance movements, and specific topics like the Polish treasures.[6]

10. This Department also obtains some economic analysis or information: but our trade with these countries has dropped sharply in recent months.

11. Military reports of a general kind are referred to the Department by the Defence Department.

12. The training value to our officers is clearly evident in those who have served in the orbit area.

[6] Voir DREC, volume 15, les documents 1010-1017./See DCER, Volume 15, Documents 1010-17.

13. There are certain limiting factors on the full utilization of our diplomatic missions in Eastern Europe.

14. One is the restriction on freedom of movement and observation referred to above. This is increasing not diminishing.

15. Another is the immense burden of office and personal management and administration enforced on the staff of our missions by living conditions in those capitals. A large part of the day must be devoted to purchase of supplies, domestic arrangements, etc.

16. A third is the fact that sufficient direction up to date has not been given from Ottawa to assist the missions in making systematic studies of special subjects which could be used here for such purposes as:

(a) defence and strategic appreciation;

(b) intelligence work;

(c) export control policy;

(d) debating and other activities at the U.N.;

(e) Canadian economic policy in conjunction with Trade and Commerce, etc.;

(f) the continuous study of Russian Communism, its aims, potential, and present tactics.

17. It is also difficult to justify the maintenance of these missions to everyone's satisfaction because

(a) their usefulness is somewhat intangible, and because it is actually undesirable to make too much in public of their function as observation points;

(b) the Heads of Mission may at any time be involved in vilification or serious charges of misbehaviour, which would embarrass the Government;

(c) the satellite missions here, working in a free country, have much greater facilities than ours for both licit and illicit activity.

18. We conclude therefore

(a) that these missions are actually, and even more potentially, of importance in our foreign service. They are in the front line of the cold war and provide a type of observation for which there is no substitute;

(b) their potential is not being exploited sufficiently to make the case for their retention easily defensible.

19. It is suggested that the following steps be taken, as occasion permits, to rectify this situation:

(i) A despatch embodying the argument outlined here — as revised in discussion — be sent to our two missions with the request that the Chargés d'Affaires not only comment on it, but state precisely what they can do to meet the deficiencies mentioned, and how far they are prevented by their circumstances from so acting.

(ii) Other Divisions and Departments should be consulted about the material to be obtained from these Missions and the use to be made of the Missions.

(iii) In order to ensure the fullest use of these Missions, if they are retained, there is called for in the Heads of Mission and officer staff rather special qualifications peculiar to the task, notably

(a) a thorough understanding of Communism;

(b) an analytical approach;

(c) if possible, some acquaintance with an Eastern European language.

(iv) Some consideration should be given to cooperating more closely and systematically in the collection and sharing of information with the representatives of our North Atlantic allies in those countries, notably the United Kingdom, United States of America and perhaps France. This can be done by the regular consultation with other diplomats with perhaps a greater exchange of working papers, despatches, etc. at the posts.

(v) Occasional visits within the curtain countries to compare notes would be technically valuable. At longer intervals it is perhaps equally desirable that officers from our curtain missions visit their Canadian colleagues in such centres as Paris, Brussels and Rome. This has the added advantage of serving as a morale builder.

USEFULNESS OF IRON-CURTAIN MISSIONS

In your notes on the question of our maintaining missions in Eastern Europe you laid considerable stress on the missions' importance as training centres. I am in full agreement. In fact I think that the unique training they provide is one of the chief justifications for their maintenance. This aspect of the missions' usefulness has perhaps tended to be overlooked; furthermore it is not easy to turn it into an effective argument in making a public case for keeping the missions. But even if the training aspect may never be one of our main weapons of defence against public criticism I think it should assume a more prominent role in our Departmental deliberations.

The main elements in the missions' usefulness as training centres seem to me to be:

(1) We are engaged in world-wide resistance to Communism and Soviet imperialism, a life and death struggle which could suddenly pass from the present so-called "cold" stage into "shooting war". Surely no effort should be spared to ensure that Canada possesses a cadre of specialists who know the enemy as well as he can be known in present circumstances. Present circumstances do permit us to send people behind the "Curtain" and, in spite of all the restrictions and frustrations experienced there, I am convinced that the most accomplished, profound and intuitive "book student" of Marxism-Leninism-Stalinism and Soviet imperialism will correct, enrich and deepen his understanding of his subject by a sojourn at a mission in a Communist capital. He will emerge from this experience much better able, on return to his own country, to advise and enlighten his own Government.

These observations are, I believe, shared by most people who have served in a "Curtain" country. We bring back some of the "Curtain" with us: there is a veil through which we find it difficult to transmit exactly the atmosphere, the "feel" and hence a complete picture of Transcurtainia to those who, no matter how percipient, have not passed through the same ordeal. Conversely, there is an immediate spiritual entente between those — even total strangers meeting for the first time — who have served at a "Curtain" post. We are all aware of the formidable "semantic barrier" which separates us from adequate intellectual intercourse with the few Eastern European Communists (without any Western intellectual training) who are willing to discuss problems freely. There are also one or two semantic hurdles which must be taken by those who have served in Transcurtainia in their efforts to present an accurate picture to their compatriots who have not. It seems to me to follow, therefore, that we need more interpreters of the "Curtain" whose combined efforts will throw increased light on the "Dark Side of the Moon".

(2) The Department has under active consideration a proposal to set up a psychological warfare organisation. There is a great scarcity of Canadians who have some familiarity with the psychology of any of the Slav nations on whom we intend to "wage war" by these means. This scarcity would become a deficiency of some gravity in the case of war. It seems therefore clear that here is another purpose for which we urgently need men whose training can only be completed by some experience behind the "Curtain". ("Refugee experts" are not a satisfactory substitute, in fact they are undesirable for several reasons: security; inability to present a genuine Canadian attitude; lack of appeal in their country of origin ranging from amused scorn to strong revulsion).

(3) In spite of all restrictions, all curbs on personal contacts, those who serve in Transcurtainia absorb a great deal of useful — not exactly information — but rather comprehension. It is a process which might be called "spiritual osmosis", a trans-membranous seepage of "feel" and "intuition" into the brain. All this may smack somewhat of the mystic, but I bring it back to the practical by adding that an indispensable instrument in this process is some knowledge of a Slav language — not perfection or fluency, but just some familiarity. I am quite sure the "osmosis" I speak of works far better with a tincture of linguistic catalyst.

(4) In your notes you also mentioned that officers going to Eastern Europe should have some previous experience abroad, a good knowledge of Communism and an analytical approach to which I can only add: amen!

(5) I would like however, to repeat some of my views on why reporting from Eastern Europe is not voluminous, but has a peculiar value. The "Curtain" missions have less information to work on. A "monolithic" instead of a diversified press; few personal contacts; excessive supervision by the local security organisations; rigid laws against espionage in which the terms "economic" and "military" are interpreted to cover the entire life of the country — all combine to put relatively little local material on an FSO's desk. But the very secrecy, the Byzantine atmosphere of intrigue under the facade of the monolithic state, make it a far more essential and incidentally difficult task to assess situations, interpret events and forecast developments than in a Western country. The press, being state-controlled and inspired, assumes an importance peculiar to Transcurtainia. It's as though our editorial pages were issued by Cabinet. Every comma must be noted, and the process becomes a form of textual criticism more closely related to the labours of Shakespearian or Biblical scholars than to those of press observers in the West. Small omissions from or additions to statements made to U.N. or the Marxist-Stalinist classics assume disproportionate significance. Nothing seems obvious any more, so that conclusions must be held in the tentative stage longer than normal while the problem is probed and discussed till far into the night with one's Western colleagues. On top of this there is a constant flood of rumours, many inspired, most of them fantastic, but still not to be ignored for they occasionally provide the shaft of light for which one has long sought in vain to illuminate a dark corner of a problem.

All this drudgery must be completed before a serious analytical despatch can be put into final form and sent to the hungry Department, which even then may be disconcerted by the number of "ifs", "buts" and "mights".

In short, without wishing to abuse the word, reporting in this area becomes a form of intelligence work. This applies especially to economic reporting: official secrecy obscures the whole economic scene, but by careful collation and interpolation of painstakingly collected newspaper and periodical clippings, vague official statistics and miscellaneous information, pieces can gradually be fitted into a jigsaw puzzle until in many cases the outlines of a picture emerge.

SWISS DECLINE PROPOSAL FOR RAISING CANADIAN LEGATION TO EMBASSY

A reply has come this morning from the Swiss to the question which, on your instructions, I raised with Mr. Nef[7] some weeks ago.

[7] Le ministre Victor Nef de la légation de Suisse.
Dr. Victor Nef, Minister, Legation of Switzerland.

2. Mr. Nef came to report that he has received a very long letter from his "Foreign Minister" (it was five pages long, single space) instructing him to express the Swiss Government's appreciation of the compliment which Canada has offered by requesting Switzerland to receive a Canadian Ambassador, and to say that Switzerland felt greatly flattered.

3. Mr. Nef said that the Canadian proposal was considered with great care by the whole Swiss Government, not merely by the Foreign Minister, and that, though the Swiss would like to accept the Canadian suggestion, they feel that the present time is not auspicious because of the difficult consequences which would confront them almost immediately by requests from the United States, Great Britain, and particularly from "iron curtain" countries; the latter would want to take the same action as Canada and, in addition, would insist on reciprocal appointment of Swiss Ambassadors in their countries. This development would make it necessary for the whole question to go to the Swiss Parliament and probably to a referendum, and the Swiss Government fears that neither Parliament nor the people would consent. The Swiss Government has decided therefore to continue their present arrangements rather than to risk disturbance of their relations with other countries which refusal by their Parliament of reciprocity would create.

4. I mentioned the representation at Berne at embassy rank of the Vatican and France. Mr. Nef explained that the Vatican representation dates from 1560 and that of France from 1874 but Switzerland does not reciprocate; in Paris there is a Swiss Minister and Switzerland has no representation at the Vatican.

5. The Swiss Minister said he assumed that his Government's reply would result in an early determination of Canada's selection of a head of mission in Berne. He said that they would be glad to receive a head of mission who, like Mr. Wilgress, would have the personal rank of Ambassador but he would, of course, have to be accredited as Minister.[8]

CABINET DOCUMENT D246 [Ottawa], April 21, 1950

DISPOSITION OF SERVICE ATTACHÉS

1. The Chiefs of Staff Committee have reviewed the present disposition of Service Attachés (excluding Washington) in the light of the following factors and present circumstances:

(a) the strategic importance of the countries to which attachés are appointed;

(b) the necessity of increasing where possible our knowledge of the Soviet Union and the satellite countries;

(c) the need for contributing to the United Kingdom-United States-Canadian pool of information so as to provide some basis for exchange;

(d) the need to perform independent Canadian assessments of the validity of United Kingdom and United States intelligence, particularly where they disagree;

(e) the possibility of the area becoming, in the event of war, a theatre of operations in which Canadian forces would be involved; and

(f) the present situation in certain Iron Curtain countries owing to the attitude of the governments towards foreign attachés of the Western Powers.

2. Experience over the past few years has shown that an attaché from one Service cannot satisfactorily meet the intelligence requirements of another Service. This is particularly true in the case of the Soviet Union and the satellite countries where personal observation is important and is the chief means of acquiring information.

3. In the light of the above, IT IS RECOMMENDED that the following additions to and changes in appointment of attachés be approved:[9]

(a) the following additional attachés be appointed:

(1) Naval attachés to Sweden and The Netherlands;

(2) (i) Military Attaché to Germany (Bonn)

(ii) Assistant Military Attaché to Sweden

[9] Le Comité du Cabinet sur la défense a approuvé ces recommandations le 25 avril 1950.
The Cabinet Defence Committee approved these recommendations on April 25, 1950.

(iii) the appointment of an assistant Military Attaché to Czechoslovakia to be reviewed in six months' time;

(b) the following changes be made in the existing disposition:

(1) the withdrawal of the Military Attachés from Greece and China and the establishment of Military Attachés in the Soviet Union and Italy;

(2) (i) the withdrawal of the assistant Air Attaché from Belgium and the establishment of an assistant Air Attaché in Yugoslavia,

(ii) the withdrawal of the Air Attaché from Argentina and the establishment of an Air Attaché in Poland to be reviewed in six months' time.

4. The immediate implications of the additions referred to in paragraph 3 fall within the already authorized attaché establishments of the respective services. However, if and when the appointment of an assistant military attaché is made to Czechoslovakia, it will increase by one the present authorized army attaché establishment.

5. The detailed considerations in respect of the requirements for the above additions and changes are attached as Appendix "A". The details of the present and proposed overall disposition of Service attachés are shown as Appendix "B".†

Annexe "A"

Appendix "A"

SECRET [Ottawa, April 21, 1950]

SERVICE ATTACHÉ REQUIREMENTS

USSR

1. The quantity of information emanating from the Service Attaché in Moscow is admittedly small. However, since the overall information available is comparatively scanty what is obtained from this source is relatively significant. Furthermore, the Service Attaché in Moscow acts as a member of the U.K.-U.S.-Canadian team and both contributes to and draws from the joint pool of information. Since the number of Service Attachés which these other countries can have in Moscow at any one time is limited, the presence of a Canadian Service Attaché is more important than would otherwise be the case.

2. The information obtained is normally the result of personal observation including such photographs of May Day and other parades as can be obtained. It is particularly important, therefore, for each Service to have its own representative in Moscow since the Air Force cannot observe satisfactorily for the Army or vice versa. Accordingly, it is proposed that a Military Attaché be appointed to Moscow in addition to the present Air Attaché.

POLAND

3. Poland is significant for the following reasons:

(a) It is strategically located on the main military route of approach to Western Europe and faces Southern Sweden across the Baltic. A major change of disposition or a build-up of the Soviet forces in this area may therefore be highly significant.

(b) Polish travel restrictions are not as severe as those in effect within the USSR and Service Attachés can travel about the country and observe both the Soviet and Polish Armies and the Polish Air Force.

(c) Poland assesses [sic] the largest satellite Air Force. While its present combat capabilities are meagre, it has very close ties with the Soviet Air Force and is based on the USSR model in respect of organization, tactical doctrines and equipment.

4. The Military Attaché in Poland has been successful in obtaining intelligence on the Soviet Army, of value from the U.K. and U.S. as well as from the Canadian point of view, and the post is considered to be a valuable one for the Army. It is felt that the importance of Poland warrants the addition of an Air Attaché and that this would materially increase the amount of intelligence coming from this country. However, in view of recent difficulties which have been encountered by the attaché staff in Poland as a result of the attitude of that government towards foreign attachés of the Western Powers, it is considered that the establishment of an additional air attaché should not be implemented immediately but be reviewed in six months' time.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

5. Czechoslovakia is technically the most advanced and developed ally of the USSR. The organization of its forces, the extent of Soviet control and the distribution of its arms products are all important. This post not only provided useful Service intelligence on Czechoslovakia, but a considerable amount of intelligence on other satellite countries and the USSR. Security measures are less effective than in most countries dominated by the Soviets, resulting in additional sources of information and relatively unrestricted travelling opportunities. The information received from the Air Attaché has been generally of high quality and considerable in quantity. The Czechoslovakian post is considered sufficiently important and useful to warrant an Assistant Military Attaché in addition to the present Air Attaché. However, in view of recent difficulties which have been encountered by the attaché staff in Czechoslovakia as a result of the attitude of that government towards foreign attachés of the Western Powers, it is considered that the establishment of an additional assistant military attaché should not be implemented immediately but be reviewed in six months' time.

YUGOSLAVIA

6. The intelligence which has been produced by the Military Attaché in Yugoslavia has been of value in London and Washington as well as Ottawa. While Yugoslavia can no longer be classed as a satellite of the USSR, she has the most powerful army and air force in the Balkans and occupies an important strategic position. It is felt that Yugoslavia is an intelligence target of sufficient importance to warrant an Assistant Air Attaché in addition to the present Military Attaché.

NATIONALIST CHINA

7. This post, which has proved very useful in the past two years, is no longer of value. The Military Attaché has been withdrawn.

SWEDEN AND FINLAND

8. Being situated on the periphery of Soviet-controlled territory, these countries have proved to be a most fruitful source of intelligence on the Soviet Union. Travel is unrestricted and intelligence unobtainable from other sources is often acquired.

9. The fact that Sweden is still not committed to the Soviet or Western Bloc, together with her strategic location and her possession of significant war industry, air, land and sea forces, combine to make her a target of unusual intelligence interest. Furthermore, many of the operating problems of all services parallel those found in Canada; hence knowledge of Swedish development is useful.

10. The present Air Attaché has provided much valuable information. In view of Sweden's all round importance, however, it is considered that the Air Attaché's efforts should be supplemented by those of Naval and Military Attachés.

NETHERLANDS

11. A Naval Attaché accredited to The Hague would be able to acquire not only intelligence regarding the forces of the Netherlands themselves but a certain amount of Far Eastern intelligence as well, as the Indonesian Navy is at present being run by officers of the Royal Netherlands Navy.

12. During the recent tour of the Minister of National Defence to European countries the Canadian Ambassador to The Hague informed the Assistant Chief of the Naval Staff that he considered a Naval Attaché should be appointed to his staff.

13. It is considered that the importance of the Royal Netherlands Navy warrants a Naval Attaché being appointed to The Hague in addition to the present Military Attaché.

BELGIUM

14. Proportionate to the size and importance of the Belgian Air Force, the flow of information from this post has been adequate. However, the effectiveness of the Belgian Air Force is slight, the aircraft industry small and unable to meet the requirements of the Air Force. When information is required on Belgium, it can usually be obtained through other channels, in particular the North Atlantic Pact (Western Union) organization. It is, therefore, proposed to withdraw the Air Attaché, but to accredit the Military Attaché in The Hague to Belgium as well as to the Netherlands.

FRANCE

15. The Military and Air Attaché posts in France have been established for a period of over three years, during which time the flow of information has been steady and timely. Since the status of France as the key to the defence of Western Europe is likely to continue for the foreseeable future, these Attaché positions are considered to be of continuing importance.

ITALY

16. The centre of military importance in the Central Mediterranean has shifted from Greece to Italy. The inclusion of Italy in the Atlantic Treaty has meant that allied plans for defence in Europe will have to provide protection for her as well. The military restrictions of the Peace Treaty will have to be lifted and military aid provided to her. It will be of considerable advantage to Canadian military planners to have firsthand intelligence on the capabilities of the Italian Army when the allocation of forces for the defence of Europe is being made. It is recommended that a military attaché post be established in Rome without delay.

GREECE

17. The Military Attaché post in Greece, which was established in September 1947, has produced a considerable volume of useful intelligence on this focal point of both Soviet and American policy in the Balkans. Very detailed and accurate information on Soviet-sponsored activities and on the progress of the civil war has been reported by the Military Attaché. However, the importance of Greece from the military intelligence point of view, has diminished. Although our Attaché has succeeded in obtaining a good deal of information from the Greek General Staff and on the Balkan Satellites, it has proved to be quite unreliable and hence of little value in Ottawa. It is proposed to discontinue this post when the tour of duty of the present Attaché is concluded.

TURKEY

18. The Turkish Army of over 300,000 men, in the process of being re-equipped and mechanized by U.S. aid, is the only significant ground force between the USSR and the Suez Canal. Our Attaché in Ankara has been given unusual opportunities to observe the Turkish Army and certain of the more important fortified lines on which the Army will fight if attacked. It is suggested that the coverage provided by the Attaché should be continued.

ARGENTINA

19. Since the appointment of an Air Attaché to Argentina, air information on the country has been received well in advance of similar intelligence from the U.S. and U.K. In particular, reports on the reorganization of the Argentine Armed Forces, notes on the employment of foreign nationals in the services and research units, and reports on aircraft acquisitions and maintenance problems have been received. However, it is undeniable that Argentina ranks low on the list of nations representing targets of intelligence interest. It is therefore proposed to withdraw this attaché and utilize this position elsewhere.

GERMANY

20. The Department of External Affairs has decided to establish a mission at Bonn and accordingly are moving some of the staff of the present Berlin military mission there. However, it is felt that it is imperative for political and psychological reasons that a mission in Berlin should be kept open. Although the amount of political reporting which can be done is limited, it is considered that Berlin is an extremely useful source of information concerning Soviet military activity and matters relating to the Soviet control of Germany's armament industry. In view of this, it is considered that a senior military officer should be accredited to the Canadian mission at Bonn, to be located in Berlin in order to look after the affairs of the military mission and act as military observer in Germany.

UNITED NATIONS — RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN KOREA

Mr. LePan referred to the attack of North Korean troops on South Korea and reported that as a result of a message received by the Secretary-General of the United Nations early on the morning of June 25, an emergency session of the Security Council had been held on the same afternoon. A resolution introduced by the United States Delegation branded the action of North Korea as constituting a breach of the peace and called upon North Korean troops to withdraw their armies to the line of the 38th Parallel. The United States resolution was presented under Article 39 of the United Nations Charter. Mr. LePan said that it was likely that the Soviets would protest the resolution alleging that it is illegal under Article 27, which requires the affirmative vote of seven members, including the concurring votes of the permanent members. The Soviet Delegation absented itself from the meeting of June 25. Although in the past an abstention by a permanent member has not affected the capacity of the Security Council to take decisions on substantive questions, the Soviet Union may claim that its own absence on June 25 invalidates the resolution passed by the Council.

Mr. LePan also commented on the attitudes of three parties to the resolution of June 25 observing that the Secretary-General in his statement had gone even further than the resolution itself in condemning the action of the North Korean authorities. It is felt that in doing so the Secretary-General wished to go on record against this act of aggression as a result of criticism recently levelled at him from certain quarters in the United States. Sir Benegal Rau, leader of the Indian Delegation and President of the Security Council for the month of June, who might have perhaps been expected to take a more lukewarm attitude towards the resolution did not attempt either to mitigate its severity or hold up its passage in any way. The Yugoslav Delegation played a modest role in the meeting and abstained in the voting on the United States resolution as a whole. After introducing its own resolution, the Yugoslav Delegation did not appear to press hard for its adoption. This might be interpreted as a sign that the Yugoslav Delegation recognizes the possibility of their requiring support under similar circumstances in the future.

KOREA

The United States Ambassador[1] called to see me this morning at 9.30. Mr. Heeney was present. He showed me a telegram which he had received from his government with the text of a statement on the Korean war, which the President proposed to issue this morning at 12.00 noon.[2] He told me that he would be sending a copy of this text shortly. I made no comment on it at the time as I wished to have a copy of the text for examination before making any observations.

At 10.45 Mr. Wrong telephoned from Washington to say that he had been asked by the State Department to meet with the other Ambassadors of the North Atlantic countries to discuss the above text, which apparently had been read to him over the telephone. Sir Oliver Franks had already expressed to the Americans the anxiety of his government over the contents of the President's statement. I told Mr. Wrong that I did not have a copy of the text before me, but that having read it earlier, I shared this anxiety, and I added that I was awaiting a copy from the U.S. Embassy, and that I would phone him, Mr. Wrong, when I received it.

A few minutes later, with the text before me, I talked with Mr. Wrong again and pointed out to him my doubts about both the form and substance of the text. I thought that the reference to "Communist imperialism" was unnecessary, while the statement that the U.S. Air and Sea Forces would give cover and support to the forces of the Republic of Korea would, in fact, involve, if carried out, intervention in this war. At the moment I was not so much concerned with the wisdom or unwisdom of such intervention as about the way in which it might be brought about. Surely if the United States wished to intervene in this way, it should be done after the matter had been discussed at the Security Council and appropriate action had been taken there through a resolution, which would bring such intervention within the terms of the Charter. As the Security Council was meeting this very afternoon, no delay would be involved in the United States bringing the matter before it. What the President was proposing was action which might mean U.S. intervention, but which would not be collective action as a result of any collective decision. This would mean that the U.S. would take the action and would expect other countries later to support and sanction it. I felt that this was the wrong way to proceed, even though I realized that the time element was so important. I wondered also whether the President in the use of the above words regarding air support realized the full implications of what he was saying.

I also questioned with Mr. Wrong the wording of the paragraph which dealt with Formosa. What, in fact, was proposed was that Formosa should become a U.S. protectorate, even though the U.S. would continue to recognize the Chiang Kai-Shek occupation regime as the Government of China. This seemed all the more anomalous, in view of the fact that the text of the President's statement ordered the Chinese Government in Formosa to cease all sea and air operations against the Chinese mainland, adding that the Seventh Fleet would see that this order was carried out.

I emphasized to Mr. Wrong that while I personally was unhappy about this statement of the President, nevertheless, it was the responsibility of the U.S. Government. However, if other countries were being invited to associate themselves with it, even through such a meeting as the one which he was about to attend, then we certainly had the right to bring our doubts to the notice of the U.S. Government.

Later, Mr. Wrong phoned to say that he had passed on the substance of my observations, which were in accordance with his own views, to George Kennan, who was impressed by them and thought that the text should be modified accordingly, and possibly not issued until later in the day.

I saw you about this matter at 11.30 and as agreed had a preliminary and informal word with Mr. Drew[3] about the developments outlined above. I told Mr. Drew that after we had heard from Mr. Wrong again you might wish to consult with him and the other Leaders. Mr. Drew expressed satisfaction at my message and my preliminary observations, and said that he would be glad to discuss the matter further with you in the afternoon, if developments made that desirable.[4]

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

KOREA

1. George Perkins was in the Chair, assisted by George Kennan, when the Ambassadors of the North Atlantic Treaty countries assembled at the State Department at 11:30 this morning. All the North Atlantic Treaty countries were represented except Luxembourg.

2. George Perkins explained that this meeting was not to be regarded as an emergency meeting of the North Atlantic Council. It had been decided to invite the Ambassadors of the North Atlantic Treaty countries as representatives of countries friendly to the United States in order that they might be informed of action which the President had decided to take to restore the situation arising from the invasion of South Korea by forces from North Korea.

3. Perkins read out the statement which the President issued at twelve noon today, the text of which I am sending in my immediately following teletype.† You will observe that the reference to Communist instigation of the attack has been reworded to omit reference to direct Soviet responsibility, to accord with the wishes expressed by the United Kingdom Government. Franks spoke briefly on this point, emphasizing that in the view of his Government it was essential to give the Russians an opportunity to beat a retreat when confronted by what he described as "the welcome manifestation of American power and determination".

4. The interesting part of the proceedings was an explanation furnished by George Kennan of the background of the considerations which led to the President's decision to order United States air and sea forces to give the Korean Government troops cover and support, and to order the Seventh Fleet to take action to prevent attack on Formosa, as well as to give further support to the Philippines and to accelerate assistance to the forces of France in Indo-China.

5. First of all, Kennan gave an analysis of the State Department's appreciation of the motives of the Communists who had been responsible for launching the attack. While stressing that this motivation was based on a mixture of considerations, he cited three factors in particular:

(a) That they thought that the time had arrived at which the arming and training of the forces of North Korea had reached a stage of completion to permit successful operations against South Korea;

(b) A realization on the part of the Soviet Government that Russia would have nothing to do with the Japanese Peace Treaty, at least in so far as its military aspects were concerned, and a desire to strengthen their strategic position in the Far East;

(c) That there was no evidence that the Soviet Government had envisaged at this time the action in Korea as developing into general war, or were conscious that it involved great risks. Kennan said that the United States experts had come to the considered opinion that the Soviet Government at this time was only willing to engage itself in a limited risk and had therefore provided itself a way out by the charge that the South Koreans had initiated the attack.

6. Turning next to the motivations of the United States policy in respect to the Korean situation, Kennan said that, in the first place, the President's decision was not dictated by any overpowering consideration of the strategic importance of Korea itself. The outstanding fact confronting the advisers to the President was the way the attack had been carried out, and that its timing was intended to give this Communist action a "tremendous symbolic significance", not only in the Far East but in the rest of the world. If the reaction of the United States Government and the rest of the free world showed a lack of determination and strength, the repercussions would be very serious.

7. Developing this concept in relation to specific territories, Kennan said that in Japan alone the results would be very serious. It was the view of all United States experts that any show of weakness on the part of United States occupation forces would have very grave consequences indeed.

8. Formosa was in all probability next on the Communist timetable, and the position there undoubtedly would be affected drastically by the outcome of events in Korea. The United States had been careful to show no inclination to intervene politically in Formosa. The action now to be taken was intended only to prevent armed attack on the Island. As a necessary corollary the Chinese Government was being called upon to cease air and naval operations against the mainland. Kennan said that the State Department expected no difficulties in getting Chiang's agreement, as he would have the best of the bargain in obtaining protection for Formosa. Kennan went on to say that there was absolutely no intention on the part of the United States Government to pre-determine the disposition of Formosa by this action. The ultimate disposition of Formosa he thought might be determined by the United Nations in accordance with the general security interests of the Pacific area and taking into account the interests of the Chinese people. The present action was only short-term action and dictated by the immediate requirements of the peace and security of the Pacific. The Philippines, Kennan said, were likewise most directly affected by developments in the security situation in Formosa. The Government there was already pressed on account of Communist agitation, and it was therefore essential to strengthen the Philippines by more direct and accelerated military assistance.

9. Finally, turning to the broader justification of United States action in respect of Korea at this time, Kennan said that it was fully realized that there was an element of risk involved in taking the action now decided, but that the risk of not taking action would be greater. The cover and support for South Korean forces did not constitute an act of hostility against the Soviet Union. The military action now authorized arose directly out of the responsibilities of the United States generally for the maintenance of international peace and security in the Pacific area, and specifically for the maintenance of the security of Japan as the power responsible for its occupation. It was his understanding that United States forces were under instruction not to operate beyond the 38th parallel in Korea. If elements of Soviet personnel were to appear south of that parallel, a completely different situation would be created and new action would then have to be considered on the part of the United States Government. Summing up, Kennan emphasized that the United States Government took the view that it was dealing with a purely local situation involving a disturbance of international peace and security resulting from an attack by dissidents in Korea against the properly established Government, the Republic of Korea. They were acting in the spirit of the United Nations resolution which called upon all members of the United Nations "to render every assistance to the United Nations" in the execution of the resolution adopted by the Security Council last Sunday.

10. In the course of the brief discussion which followed, one or two points of interest came up which are worth reporting. On the timing of the United States decision, Kennan stressed the serious practical difficulties involved in co-ordinating the many civil and military authorities under the United States system of Government, both in Washington and in the area involved. This accounted for the fact that the United States Government had been unable to consult with friendly nations before taking their decision. Events, moreover, had developed so quickly and the military situation had deteriorated so rapidly that Kennan expressed some doubt whether even now the action which would be taken would restore the situation in South Korea. He said that orders had already gone out to General MacArthur during the course of the night to take the military action authorized in the President's statement and the United States representative in Formosa had already received his instructions to approach Chiang.

11. Having in mind your views regarding timing of the President's statement in relation to Security Council action, I asked about the State Department's view of the legal basis for the action announced in the President's statement in relation to the Security Council resolution adopted last Sunday and the resolution to be introduced this afternoon. Kennan admitted that the question of legality might indeed be raised, but explained that the United States Government regarded itself as fully covered by the previous Security Council resolution calling upon "all members of the United Nations to render every assistance to the United Nations". As the only country with forces available in immediate proximity to the area in which international peace and security had thus been disturbed, and also having in mind the primary responsibility of the United States for the security of Japan as well as for the general peace and stability in that part of the Pacific, the United States Government felt it had no alternative but to take the action now authorized as a measure of assistance to the United Nations in restoring and maintaining international peace and security in the area affected.

12. Some reference was also made to the implications of the events in Korea upon security in Europe. Kennan mentioned that the State Department had received messages from Paris and The Hague expressing concern that the attack in Korea represented a real test by the Communists of the United States policy of peace through strength. Kennan underlined the possible implications which the events in Korea might have, particularly in regard to Germany. If the Communist efforts in Korea and other weak spots in the Pacific were successful, he had no doubt that a similar test of strength would follow in Germany. There was no disposition on the part of the Ambassadors to disagree with this view and several of them expressed general agreement with, and appreciation for, Kennan's review of the background of the considerations which had led to the President's decision on Korea.

KOREA

1. In other messages today I have described the action taken by the United States Government and the reasons given by the State Department which led to the decision of the President. This message contains some thoughts of my own.

2. Since I learned on Sunday morning of the attack on South Korea I have been in doubt whether the necessary degree of resolution and military strength would be forthcoming here to defeat what must certainly be an effort directed from Moscow to undermine the position of the Western countries, and of the United States in particular, in the Far East. The President's decision and the reasons given for it go much further than I had expected and reveal that the United States, in spite of domestic controversy over Far Eastern policy, can promptly adopt firm and far-reaching measures. I share the belief expressed today at the State Department that the risks of inaction are greater than the admitted risks of the steps announced. The resolution and prompt action of the United States should obliterate in this context haunting memories of the results of indecision and attempts at compromise in relations with Germany, Italy and Japan in the years before the war.

3. One striking feature has been that the United States has shouldered the load which it alone was in a position to carry, without seeking to secure pledges of material assistance from other countries in advance. They are concerned, of course, to establish that their action is in support of the United Nations and in conformity with the recommendations of the Security Council, but initially at least they are now seeking from other friendly countries no more than moral and diplomatic support. At this morning's meeting at the State Department no word was said in favour of more direct aid by other countries, and it was positively asserted that only the United States was able to undertake any immediate measures.

4. These decisions should, in time, bring to an end much of the domestic dispute over Far Eastern policy. They should also establish to the satisfaction of all but a few bigoted isolationists that no return is now possible to the old attitude of complacent self-sufficiency in international affairs. Of course, if the Soviet Government reacts violently and itself takes over military action in support of North Korea, no-one can tell into what we shall all be led. I think however, that I am right in saying that the last occasion in which the Russians risked direct military action to extend their sphere was their own attack on Finland in 1939. The other extensions of their sphere have come either as a result of general war or by the process of internal subversion.

5. One important aspect of this decision is that it makes amends for the now evident inadequacy of United States policies in South Korea over the last year or so, which left the Republic unprepared in terms of defensive arms, such as anti-tank and anti-aircraft guns and stocks of ammunition, and which were presumably based, in part, on inadequate intelligence and faulty appreciations of the actual situation.

6. With regard to the measures taken, only the event can tell whether the military assistance afforded will have come soon enough and will be sufficient to accomplish the objective. If naval and air support alone cannot enable the South Korean forces to expel the invaders, the way is still open for the commitment of ground forces if necessary. I can only assume that the decision was based on the best military appraisal of what was immediately required and could be provided in the shortest possible time.

7. The President's announcement also seems to leave the Nationalist Government on Formosa in the strange position of being reduced to the status of a Chinese Government-in-exile, subject to orders from the United States, which is permitted to retain control for the present of an Island the eventual status of which is undetermined, but is not permitted to dispute control of the Chinese mainland. The boldness and simplicity of this attack on the recurrent Formosa problem do not mean that it will not continue to be an international headache, and there will undoubtedly be further explanations required from the Administration.

8. It is too early to judge with any certainty what the reaction of public opinion in this country will be, but the first indications are distinctly encouraging. I hope that in any public comment you may be called on to make you will feel able to welcome in cordial terms the action announced by the President. A statement on these lines by the Canadian Government, together with the endorsement already given in London, would be of real value to the Administration.

Following is revised text of United States draft resolution on Korea submitted to Security Council 27th June, 1950. Text Begins: "The Security Council, HAVING determined that the armed attack upon the Republic of Korea by forces from North Korea constitutes a breach of the peace,

HAVING called for an immediate cessation of hostilities, and

HAVING called upon the authorities of North Korea to withdraw forthwith their armed forces to the 38th parallel, and

HAVING noted from the report of the United Nations Commission for Korea that the authorities in North Korea have neither ceased hostilities nor withdrawn their armed forces to the 38th parallel and that urgent military measures are required to restore international peace and security, and

HAVING noted the appeal from the Republic of Korea to the United Nations for immediate and effective steps to secure peace and security, RECOMMENDS that the members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area." Text ends.

Reference my telephone conversations with LePan.

At this afternoon's session of the Security Council the United States and Yugoslavia presented their resolutions,[5] and the former was given unequivocal support by the United Kingdom, France, China, Cuba, Ecuador and Norway. Austin quoted Truman's statement and most of the other representatives expressed explicit gratification with what the United States had done.

There were reports that Rau would propose a meeting between Stalin and Truman, but he assured the Americans that he would not do so with specific reference to Korea. He began the session with a reference to the effect on Indo-Pakistan relations of the meeting between Liaquat and Nehru this spring but left the council to draw its conclusion.

Rau wished to adjourn the session until to-morrow, as he had received no instructions, but the Americans insisted that the Council must support their action with a decision today. The most they would agree to was a few hours adjournment. (The discussion on this question was, of course, in private). The Americans had every sympathy with the Indians and Egyptians and would very much have liked their affirmative votes, but they considered it more important to have a decision today — especially as there was no certainty of Egyptian and Indian support in the end.

After several postponements, the Council met again after ten o'clock. Fawzi expressed great regret at not being able "for physical and geographical reasons" to vote. The issue was too grave for him to vote without having received his instructions. He formally reserved the right of his Government to communicate its views through the appropriate channel not only on today's resolution but also on Sunday's hinting in not very clear language that they may wish to suggest "additions if not exactly variations". His position on the voting would be that of "non-participation".

Rau then said that India had voted for the resolution of the 25th. That was an important step, but the issues in the present resolution were far more momentous and he could not take the responsibility of voting without instructions. He was deeply apologetic for having held up the Council and not having succeeded in his attempt to communicate with Delhi. India, with the exception of China was closest to the scene of all those in the Council, and his Government must weigh all the consequences. His position likewise was that of "non-participation".

Voting on the resolutions was as follows:

United States resolution: 7 in favour; Yugoslavia against; no abstentions; 2 non-participating.

Yugoslav resolution: One in favour; 7 against; no abstentions; 2 non-participating.

As the meeting was on the point of adjourning calls came through from Alexandria and Delhi. The Council waited for a few minutes until it was suddenly and without explanation adjourned by the Acting President, Menon of India. The reason, I learned afterward, was that the telephone communications had again failed. Rau had not been able to hear a word Nehru was saying. Cordier told me the adjournment was sine die.

During the intermission I had a talk with Ambassador Chang of Korea who had virtually collapsed of relief over the day's events. He was very bitter, however, about the postponement of the Council's decision which, he said, might cost thousands of Korean lives. I took the opportunity of expressing to him our sympathy with his country, and he seemed gratified.

Following from Heeney, Begins: You may wish to have our preliminary appreciation of the situation which has been created by the attack on the Republic of Korea. This appreciation is based on statements made by the Minister at an off-the-record press conference yesterday.

2. Strategically, the loss of Korea, south of the 38th Parallel, would not result in any substantial weakening of the forces now available to the anti-Communist world. Indeed, it seems likely that United States strategists had clearly anticipated that South Korea could not be held indefinitely against determined Communist attacks, although it is equally clear that they were caught napping by the events of last weekend. The failure of the United States intelligence services to provide Washington with some warning of the stroke (which must have been in preparation for at least some days) is one of the most puzzling features of the attack. On the other hand, the fact that forces had been massed on both sides of the frontier for some months may have provided a cover which masked the invaders plans.

3. If the strategic consequences of the loss of Korea would not be serious, the moral consequences would be grave in the extreme. A state which had been created by the United Nations would have been destroyed by naked aggression. And other countries, particularly in South and South-East Asia, which are open to Communist attacks would be disheartened and demoralized.

4. The success of efforts to save Korea will depend, of course, almost entirely on what action it proves possible for the United States Government to take. The statement made by Mr. Truman at noon today [June 27] seems to us a courageous step. But there is still some doubt as to what degree of military intervention the President is prepared to authorize and also as to how far it will be possible for the United States to limit its involvement in the conflict once air and naval forces have been committed to action.

5. Speculation at this stage is particularly risky; but it is not (repeat not) our view that the attack on Korea is likely to herald a new series of outbreaks. In all probability there will not be a chain reaction. Our tentative view is that the Communists decided to strike in South Korea in order to gather up one of the few remaining fragments in Asia now outside their control before the Military Defence Assistance Programme of the United States could become fully effective in the Far East and before a new and vigorous United States policy in that area had become crystallized. At the moment, however, it is impossible to rule out entirely the contingency that even the most far-reaching and catastrophic events may be precipitated.

6. In any case, even if the war in Korea can be localized, this act of aggression is bound to lead to further deterioration in the relations between the Communist and non-Communist worlds, especially since, for the first time, the Communists have chosen to try to achieve their ends by bare-faced, old-fashioned military invasion. It may be argued that the fighting now taking place is really a form of civil war, since the bulk of the combatants on both sides are undoubtedly Koreans. But this argument can hardly stand up against the contention that the Republic of Korea is an independent State with a government created by action of the United Nations.

7. The consequences for the United Nations itself are also bound to be serious. The ten proposals made by Mr. Lie now have a somewhat academic air.[6] Moreover, countries contemplating recognition of the Peoples Government in Peking will inevitably find such action more difficult in the present changed climate of opinion; and there will therefore be less hope of success for efforts to regularize the situation within the United Nations by seating a representative of the Peoples Government in Peking. If at the meeting of the Security Council on Sunday, the Soviet Union and the Peking Government had been represented, they would have been able to use delaying tactics and ultimately to veto the resolution. On the other hand, their presence would have made it easier to press home the charges against those responsible for the aggression and to force them to answer for their complicity.

8. It will probably be argued by Soviet apologists that the resolution passed by the Security Council on the 25th of June is illegal because it was not passed with the concurring votes of all the permanent members. In rebuttal, it could be urged that the practice by which an abstention of one of the permanent members has been construed to be equivalent to assent could be extended to cover as well the absence of a permanent member. These legal disputes, however, are perhaps immaterial when set beside the plain fact that the United States has secured a condemnation of this Communist attack by all those members of the Security Council which were present (with the single exception of Yugoslavia, which abstained) and has thus obtained strong moral support for whatever military measures it feels able to take in Korea. Ends.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS; KOREAN SITUATION

8. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that recent information indicated that the South Korean position was deteriorating rapidly and that the capital had been lost to the North Korean forces. It appeared that the United States would have to act quickly and in all probability with more than air and naval forces. A recent telegram† from the Canadian High Commissioner in London reported that consideration was being given by the U.K. authorities to placing a naval force at the disposal of General MacArthur. In addition, the question of providing land forces from Hong Kong was being studied.

9. Mr. Pearson said that some weeks ago the Canadian Government had received a request from the United Nations to provide two military officers for the U.N. Observation Corps in Korea. These could be either Permanent Force or Reserve Force officers. Recently the Secretary-General had indicated that the latest developments made it even more desirable that Canada comply with this request and it was felt that to do so would be an indication of our good will.

10. The Minister of National Defence believed that, with respect to other aid, the only practical contribution that could be made at the present time appeared to be provision of a number of Canadian destroyers and possibly a small squadron of transport aircraft. While it was considered that more naval forces would probably be available than necessary, nevertheless a Canadian contribution might be a desirable gesture. Information regarding the desirability of Canadian participation and the form it might take could be sought from the Secretary-General of the United Nations and from the military authorities in Washington.

11. The Prime Minister suggested that any Canadian action should follow from a concerted U.N. decision and as a result of joint action. It would be helpful if the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence were to obtain all possible information on the desirability of Canadian participation and of form in the Korean war as soon as possible.

12. The Cabinet, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that two military officers be made available to the U.N. Observation Corps in Korea as soon as possible; and,

(b) that a decision on what form Canadian assistance in enforcing the Resolution of the Security Council might take be deferred pending the obtaining of all possible information by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence on the need for and availability of such assistance.

Following for the Ambassador from Heeney, Begins: You will be receiving separately the text of the statement made by the Minister in the House of Commons this morning. As I said on the telephone he welcomed the firm stand taken by the United States within the framework of the United Nations and indicated clearly the Canadian Government's support. His statement was apparently well received on all sides of the House. Mr. Graydon and Mr. Knowles for the Conservative and C.C.F. parties expressed full agreement with Mr. Pearson's statement.

2. The Cabinet met this afternoon and, considering what Canada might do in response to last night's Resolution of the Security Council, agreed as follows:

(a) to send to Korea the two Canadian observers which the U.N. Secretary General has been urging us to do;

(b) to instruct Holmes to enquire in New York what other "like-minded" United Nations were doing or proposed to do in response to the Security Council's Resolution; and

(c) to have Air Vice Marshal Campbell enquire in Washington through Service channels what kind of contribution on the part of Canada would be most acceptable and effective; in particular Campbell was to enquire whether the despatch of two Canadian destroyers from the Pacific Coast to MacArthur's Command would be useful.

3. Holmes is being instructed this afternoon in the sense of (a) and (b) of the preceding paragraph. The reference to (c) at the moment is solely for your own information. Campbell is to receive instructions from National Defence, the Cabinet being categorical that these enquiries should be conducted through Service channels only. Ends.

Repeat Permdel No. 35.

1. Perkins, who is responsible for liaison with North Atlantic countries on Korea because of the great pressure on other senior officers of the State Department, asked me to see him this afternoon in connection with your statement in the House this morning. Neither of us had seen the full text. He had a brief report from the United States Embassy. He said that they were very gratified by your general line and in particular by your indication that the Government was considering means of Canadian participation.

2. He went on to say that the Administration attached great importance to securing the participation of other countries in the application of the resolution of the Security Council. They earnestly hoped that something more specific would be forthcoming promptly from Canada and some other countries in order to make the action to restore conditions in Korea a collective action under the auspices of the United Nations.

3. He had asked me to see him today in the hope that some further statement might be cleared in Ottawa this afternoon or evening. I told him that I thought the necessary Ministerial consultation could at best not take place before tomorrow morning or possibly Friday, but that I would report the views of the State Department to you at once.

4. We discussed briefly what form Canadian participation might take. He said that at the moment they were more concerned that a definite undertaking to participate in collective action should be made in a public statement than with the designation of specific forces. Expressing a personal view, I said that probably the easiest thing might turn out to be the despatch of perhaps two destroyers to Far Eastern waters. He remarked that because of the great length of the Korean coastline he was sure that this would be very welcome and useful. While the bulk of the load must obviously be carried by the United States, even token contributions from other countries would, from a diplomatic and moral point of view, be of substantial value.

5. He had only received a brief press summary of Mr. Attlee's offer to give naval assistance, and, while this was most welcome, he was a little disturbed by press reports to the effect that Mr. Attlee had talked of this as giving aid to the United States. The State Department would much prefer that any assistance rendered should be given to the Korean Republic under the resolution of the Security Council, although, of course, consultation with the United States military authorities would be essential. I said that I had understood from a telephone conversation with Heeney that you had told the House this morning that the Canadian Government would consult with other members of the United Nations on the part that Canada might play in applying the resolution in question. This, I think, is just the line they want other countries to follow in this connection.

6. I gathered from this talk that offers of assistance should not, in the view of the State Department, be addressed to the Security Council, which has no responsibility for directing the operations now in progress.

Memorandum from Acting Head, United Nations Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs[7]

This afternoon, about 5.30 p.m., Mr. Wrong telephoned me to let us know that his most immediate teletype WA-1422 of the 28th of June, reporting on a conversation he had had about an hour previously with George Perkins of the State Department, was on its way. In the course of the conversation Mr. Wrong passed on a number of points of interest which are not contained in his teletype.

2. In the teletype it is stressed that the State Department are anxious that the Canadian Government should announce some concrete measures as quickly as possible. When I said over the telephone to Mr. Wrong that there did not seem to me to be any mid-way point between such a statement as Mr. Pearson made this morning in the House of Commons and an announcement that the Canadian Government was sending forces to Korea (perhaps two destroyers), he said that in the State Department's view a highly valuable statement could be made which would yet fall somewhat short of the clear-cut decision to despatch Canadian forces. The Canadian Government could announce, for example, that it was prepared to make two destroyers available for the defence of Korea and would consult urgently with other members of the United Nations who are in a position to contribute forces, with a view to determining whether such vessels would be useful and, if so, how they could best be employed. This suggestion, incidentally, amplifies and elucidates the last paragraph of Mr. Wrong's teletype, in which he reports that "offers of assistance should not, in the view of the State Department, be addressed to the Security Council, which has no responsibility for directing the operations now in progress."

3. Mr. Wrong also had some information of interest about the present military situation in Korea. Perkins had told him that United States aircraft now operating over Korea were experiencing difficulty in finding targets. They were attacking whatever tanks they could spot. But they did not know where else to direct their fire since their communications with the Korean ground forces were highly ineffective. Perkins thought that it would be necessary almost at once to land some United States technical units, particularly signalmen, in Korea in order to maintain liaison between the ground and air forces. Mr. Wrong and I agreed that this would appear to be only the beginning of a process which perhaps gradually, but inevitably, would involve the commitment of United States ground forces of all arms and services to the fighting in Korea.

Following for the Ambassador from Heeney, Begins: In this morning's statement in the House the Prime Minister referred, as you know, to possible employment of Canadian Naval units in operations in the Korean situation.

2. Mr. St. Laurent said in effect that the West Coast destroyers which had been intended to participate in a European cruise this summer would now move into "Western Pacific waters where the ships would be closer to the area where they might be of assistance to the United Nations and Korea, if such assistance were required".

3. Orders have now been given for two destroyers to sail from Esquimalt for Pearl Harbour early next week, to be followed shortly by a third. The Commanding Officer[9] has been told that he can expect orders later. The intention is of course that these vessels will be placed under the operational orders of whatever Commander is clothed with the authority of the United Nations.

4. We expect, of course that the U.N. Commander will in the event be a U.S. officer, probably MacArthur. Nevertheless since the Government attach very great importance to maintaining the U.N. aspect of the Korean operations we have avoided and will continue to avoid any suggestion that the aid we are giving is assistance to the United States. We are quite sure that U.S. authorities themselves share this view.

5. Holmes has been instructed as a matter of urgency to inform the Secretary General of the views expressed in my preceding paragraph. It seems to us that the simplest course would be for the Security Council to give MacArthur a mandate to organize and direct the forces now being made available by various members of the United Nations. We understand that informal consultations have been taking place in New York today looking toward such an act of devolution. It is our hope that some such arrangement may be completed without delay. There would be no need to have the Security Council involved in strategic direction, which we realize would be objectionable.

6. The press here are being told that our destroyers will sail from Esquimalt early next week for the Western Pacific and in answer to any further enquiries are being referred to the Prime Minister's statement in the House of Commons this morning.

Following for Heeney, Begins: Your telephone call this morning. I have not been able to communicate with the Secretary-General as yet, but I have told Cordier that I have been asked to communicate to the Secretary-General as quickly as possible the very strong view of both the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson on the importance of giving full and ostensible United Nations aegis to the operations against the North Koreans. I said that the Canadian Government attached the highest importance to this aspect of the present endeavour. I indicated that we were not proposing any particular formula and that we knew that this matter was under urgent consideration, but that the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson thought it particularly desirable to clothe General MacArthur immediately with a United Nations authority. Cordier said "we agree with you a hundred percent". He seemed very pleased to know at this time that the thinking in Ottawa was along these lines. He said that they were working hard on the question at the moment and hoped that it might be possible for the Security Council to take action about MacArthur's position this afternoon.

2. Cordier said that he would convey the Prime Minister's and the Minister's views to the Secretary-General immediately. Nevertheless I will endeavour to speak personally to the Secretary-General as soon as possible. I understand that he is at the moment engaged on this very question.

3. Cordier did not imply in any way that there was a dispute with the Americans or anyone else on this issue, and I should like to emphasize, as I said on the telephone, that I believe the Americans to be quite as anxious as we are to make this a United Nations rather than a United States operation. I have been discussing this question with both the British and Americans for the past thirty-six hours, and both are obviously bending as far as possible to give this all the characteristics of a United Nations project. For a short time they considered working through the Military Staff Committee but quickly rejected this idea because of the position of the Russians if not as participators at least as receivers of documents. They then considered a Security Council sub-committee to coordinate military activities, but realized that effective coordination could not be achieved in this way. Some members of the Security Council, they thought, would prefer not to be involved in questions of strategy. Furthermore a United Nations subcommittee is hardly a body to make tactical decisions and work in fields involving a high degree of security. Both the British and American view tends towards the conclusion, however, that there must be some United Nations cover for the operation and that pledges of support should be made to the United Nations and certainly not to the United States, although coordination of forces involved will inevitably be on an ad hoc basis and will in fact mean primarily tactical coordination with the United States forces. The United States delegation view as to how countries might in the present stage determine the nature of their contributions is that they should make private enquiries of the United States military, who are the only ones in a position to know what is needed, and then make a public announcement that forces along this line are being offered in support of the United Nations.

1. With reference to Heeney's telephone conversation with me, I spoke from Hickerson's office where I had gone to leave the text of the Prime Minister's statement this morning and to discuss the question of bringing the command of the operations under the aegis of the United Nations in some manner.

2. Hickerson assured me that this had been under very active consideration since the decision was taken to employ American forces. The administration could not easily accept the direct designation of MacArthur by the Security Council as Commander because of the serious risk that this would involve interference in the conduct of operations by the Security Council or Secretary-General. They had given thought to a number of alternatives because they are themselves anxious that the whole affair should be conducted throughout as an operation in support of the United Nations.

3. They have rejected for the present the idea that the Security Council might ask the Republic of Korea to designate the Commander, as this would imply that he drew his authority in some measure from that Government. If, for instance, Korean morale slumped heavily or if the President were taken prisoner, the Korean Government might conceivably dismiss MacArthur.

4. There are also difficulties in the way of naming MacArthur personally as Commander through whatever procedure might be adopted. If he were incapacitated, it would be necessary to name a new Commander and it would, therefore, be more satisfactory to designate the United States Commander in the area as the Supreme Commander.

5. There are serious legal difficulties about the formal designation of the United States forces as United Nations forces. The act covering United States participation in the United Nations only authorizes forces made available under Article 43[10] of the Charter to operate as United Nations forces outside the authority of Congress. Congressional control is retained under this Act of any other forces made available to the United Nations, which technically remain United States forces operating to enforce Security Council decisions.

6. There remain three possible solutions which they are now considering:

(a) That the Security Council should ask the United States to take command of the forces offered by any members of the United Nations;

(b) That the Security Council should request the participating countries to establish a unified command; and

(c) That the Security Council should note with approval that the forces provided by all members are operating under a unified command.

7. The last of these is the easiest, but I am not sure that it would adequately meet your point of view. As these matters are under very active consideration in the State Department, your comments would be welcome as soon as possible.

8. I have not repeated in this message the objections to a fairly direct form of United Nations control which Hickerson made to me, as these are clearly stated in paragraph 3 of Holmes' message to you No. 421 of today.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: Hickerson has just given me the gist of a proposed resolution on the command problem which is acceptable to the Department of Defense but has not yet been considered by Acheson and his senior group in the State Department. He asks for our informal views as soon as possible as I think they would like to get the matter cleared in the Security Council very promptly. I gather the Security Council is on call for another meeting on very short notice.

2. After the usual preamble the Security Council in the resolution would welcome the prompt and vigorous support for the enforcement of its resolutions of Sunday and Tuesday. It would then note with gratification that a number of members have offered assistance to the Republic of Korea and would request the Secretary-General to inform the Korean Government of all these offers. Finally, it would recommend that all members providing forces under the Security Council resolutions should place these forces under the unified command of the United States.

3. The only alternative for which he thinks he might get support would be a recommendation that the members contributing forces should agree on a unified command. This is not so acceptable to the Defense authorities here and leaves the matter open for some further collective action by the members concerned. Ends.

(b) You should also make clear to him the great importance which the Canadian Government attaches to the necessity of clothing General MacArthur with the mantle of the United Nations. It is the Government's view that the best way to demonstrate that General MacArthur is acting under the auspices of the United Nations is for the Security Council to give him its mandate to organize and command the forces now being made available by members of the United Nations for the defence of Korea. In communicating these views to Mr. Lie you should inform him that you are speaking with explicit authority both from the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson. Ends.

Your telegram No. 305 of June 30th — Korea.

As your telegram No. 306† containing the text of the Prime Minister's statement reached me only a few minutes before two o'clock, I was unable to present it to the Secretary-General as you requested. However, I prepared a covering despatch† to the Secretary-General in which, in accordance with your instructions, I drew his attention to the passage referring to the type of assistance "which Canada might be able to make available". This together with the text I took immediately to Lake Success. As I arrived at twenty to three, it was impossible to see the Secretary-General immediately, and I delivered the statement to Cordier so that it might be made available in time for the Council. Cordier had it prepared as a Security Council document which was distributed within an hour.

2. During the course of the Security Council meeting, the unhappy Zinchenko as Assistant Secretary-General was called upon to read a summary of all the communications made to the Secretary-General on this matter. The summary included the unfavourable comments of the Soviet Union and Satellites, but consisted for the most part of the highlights of the communications from countries offering support. This group had been swollen by a considerable number of Latin American countries, including Argentina, which offered moral support but avoided material commitments. The summary was, of course, prepared by the Secretariat which had not had time to consult with delegations. In referring to the Canadian communication, Zinchenko said simply that a letter had been received from the acting representative enclosing the text of a statement made by the Prime Minister, in which Mr. St. Laurent stated that naval units which were proceeding to Western European waters for summer exercises would be moved into Western Pacific waters where the ships would be close to the area where they might be of assistance to the United Nations and Korea if such assistance were required. No reference was made to the other parts of the Prime Minister's statement.

3. When I delivered the statement to Cordier, I drew his attention to the emphasis which the Prime Minister had made on the United Nations character of the operation, and emphasized again what I said to him on the telephone earlier, that the greatest importance was attached in Ottawa to this aspect. A short time later I managed to speak to the Secretary-General. I repeated to him what I had said to Cordier, and in order to make these representations explicit I read to him the substance of paragraph (b) of your telegram No. 305. Mr. Lie indicated that he had already heard our views from Cordier and was very pleased to have them. He indicated agreement with the views and urged us to communicate these views to the Americans and the British.

4. I had a conversation with Jebb in which I interpreted to him the views of the Canadian Government. He expressed agreement with this approach and said that he had been engaged in long discussions with the Americans on the subject. The United Kingdom, he said, were also anxious that the operation should be ostensibly a United Nations operation, and he confirmed my opinion that the United States was in agreement in principle. He pointed out, however, that there were serious difficulties which the Americans faced and he thought we ought not to press them too hard at the moment, particularly in view of the announcement which had just been made authorizing the use of American ground forces. He pointed out the difficulties which the Americans might have with Congress on this matter and that we should all show due consideration. He himself thought that although the United Nations could not set up anything like a joint staff directing military operations, nevertheless there should be a committee of some sort. He thought, however, that we should wait for a few days to see how operations developed before establishing such a committee.

5. The subject of the United Nations direction of military activities was not raised during the Council meeting. Cordier told me before the meeting that no agreement had been reached on this subject. The Americans have also emphasized to me that this matter was being given thorough consideration in discussions they have been having with their own military and officers of the United Nations but they have said that they could not give me any details at the present time. As you had not specifically instructed me to make representations to them on this matter, I have not done so, as it seemed to me that Mr. Wrong was in much better position to explain our point of view and secure results.

Following for the Ambassador from Heeney, Begins: I have now had an opportunity of discussing with the Minister your telegrams WA-1444 and 1447 of June 30 concerning command of United Nations forces in Korea.

2. As you are aware, we attach the greatest importance to having operations brought as soon as possible under the aegis of the United Nations. At the same time, we understand the importance of avoiding constitutional difficulties and congressional embarrassments in Washington.

3. We are not satisfied with the proposed resolution referred to in paragraph 2 of your telegram WA-1447, as suggested by Hickerson. However, we think that, combined with the solution described in paragraph 6(a) of your telegram WA-1444, something might be drafted which would fill the bill. We try our hand at a draft on this basis in my next following paragraph.

4. The operative part of the Security Council's resolution might read somewhat as follows.

> Draft resolution begins: The Security Council requests the United States to designate a commander (or commander-in-chief) of the forces made available by members of the United Nations under the Security Council resolutions; and, Recommends that all members providing forces under the said resolutions place such forces under the United Nations commander so designated. Draft resolution ends.

5. It seems to us that such a resolution would give to the Korean operations a genuine United Nations character. At the same time we cannot see that it would impinge upon the rights of Congress or the freedom of action of MacArthur, as commander of the predominant United States forces involved.

6. We would hope that such a resolution would be agreeable to the United Kingdom as the largest contributor of forces other than the United States. If so, it would seem to us appropriate that the United Kingdom representative should introduce the resolution in the Security Council.

7. We are sending you this message at once so that you can take the matter up this morning with Hickerson. Later we will send on a full draft resolution which will include the kind of preamble we think would be desirable. Ends.

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures[11]

Memorandum by Secretary of State for External Affairs[11]

SECRET Ottawa, July 3, 1950

DRAFT SECURITY COUNCIL KOREA RESOLUTION

The United States and United Kingdom first reaction to our suggested resolution for bringing action in Korea under United Nations auspices seems to be as follows.

They have no comments on the first two paragraphs.

On paragraph 3, Mr. Holmes feels that the British would wish to amend this resolution to avoid embarrassing the French and other countries which may have sound reasons for not sending forces to Korea. This might be done by inserting after the word "assistance", the words "and which are in a position to do so".

This seems to be a sensible suggestion, though it will, of course, give the Latin American states an excuse for doing nothing. However, as there are only two or three of them which could be of any assistance in any event, this might not matter so much. Mr. Hickerson on Saturday informed Mr. Wrong that they were considering approaches to Latin American states for concrete assistance, and that he himself would like to see such assistance despatched, even though it was of little military value. Certainly, we have some right to expect that such countries as Argentina, Brazil, Mexico and Chile should do something.

Neither the British nor the Americans like paragraph 4 of the resolution. The British would like to delete it, as they are afraid that its specific reference to "United Nations forces" might be interpreted to mean that Article 42[12] has been invoked. They are anxious to avoid this because it would mean invoking also the military staff machinery, which might bring the U.S.S.R. into the picture. The Americans do not object to the paragraph as such, but do not wish any reference to be made to "United Nations forces"; partly because of the reasons advanced by the British, and partly because of their special congressional difficulties.

We might meet these objections by altering paragraph 4 so that it would read, "Consider that it is urgent that provision be made for a commander to take command of forces made available by members of the United Nations ... etc."

In paragraph 5, the Americans also would prefer to have "the commander" rather than "a commander" designated, to avoid the possibility of a further resolution of the Security Council being necessary if a change in command had to be made. This seems to be a sensible amendment. Paragraph 5 might now read,

Article 42 permits the Security Council to take military action to maintain international peace and security when peaceful sanctions have failed.

"Requests the United States to designate the commander of the forces made available under the Security Council resolutions."

The Americans do not accept the reference in paragraph 6 to the "United Nations commander" for the reasons indicated above. We could meet them on this and delete these words, as the point we are anxious to establish has, I think, been made sufficiently clear in the preceding paragraphs of the resolution.

In the afternoon of Tuesday,[14] you saw Mr. Drew, Mr. [Stanley] Knowles,[15] representing the CCF, and Mr. Solon Low,[16] and brought them up-to-date on Korean developments. I was also present.

On Wednesday I made a statement in the House associating the Government with the Security Council resolution which had been passed the previous afternoon by a majority of 7 to 1 (later increased to 8, as India acceded). This statement received the support of the official opposition, the CCF and, later, the Social Credit party.

The developments on Thursday were as follows. Cabinet discussed the situation at its 2.00 o'clock meeting and decided nothing need be said at that time regarding participation in the carrying out of the Security Council resolution. In the afternoon, during the debate on the External Affairs estimates, I was pressed by the opposition to state what we were doing, and replied in general terms that we would do our full duty, but only as a member of the United Nations in concert with other members. I also emphasized that, as the situation was very fluid, it was impossible to say what contribution, if any, Canada could make to United Nations collective action; that we would have to consider the matter in the light of developments. Mr. Drew did not quarrel with this attitude; in fact he supported it. Likewise Mr. Knowles and Mr. Solon Low approved of it, though Mr. Diefenbaker[17] and Mr.

Green[18] seemed impatient that we were not able to announce in concrete terms what we were going to do. It was during this discussion that Mr. Pouliot[19] made a somewhat ambiguous statement, the general effect of which was, however, that we should do nothing.

On Thursday evening, Mr. Howe, Mr. Claxton and I met you in your office at 11.30 p.m. when we discussed the whole matter. Mr. Claxton, Mr. Howe and I felt, as you will remember, that we should indicate that we were prepared to assist in terms of light naval forces, if the United Nations required such assistance. You felt strongly, and we agreed with you, that such assistance, if given, should only be in response to a request from the United Nations and in support of an operation authorized and sponsored by the United Nations.

On Friday morning at 10.00 o'clock we met again in your office when I produced a draft of the statement which, with amendments, was given by you in the House of Commons. This statement emphasized that our obligations were only those of a member of the United Nations, but pointed out that we were ordering certain destroyers into the Pacific so that we would be in a better position to fulfil those obligations, if developments made that desirable, in terms of naval support to United Nations activities in Korean waters. This statement received general support, and even Mr. Pouliot had nothing to say against it.

At 2.00 o'clock that afternoon the Security Council met and your statement was read as an indication of Canada's acceptance of the resolution of Tuesday.

Since Friday we have been very active, through Mr. Wrong in Washington and Mr. Holmes in Lake Success, in working out with the British and the Americans a formula which would make it clear that the operations being conducted in Korea are under the authority of the United Nations, exercised through a commander appointed by the United Nations. Discussions have also been going on as to the appointment of some United Nations Commission which would be the channel of communication from the commander to the United Nations in respect of policy questions and offers of assistance in this matter. This has been a difficult and complicated business. Constitutionally, the United States Government cannot put its forces under United Nations command, except as a result of military agreements concluded under Article 43. No such agreements, as you know, have been made, and in any event it would be difficult to invoke Article 43 without bringing the Russians in. We are getting over this difficulty by a resolution of the Security Council which would make it clear that, while military control and direction would have to remain under the United States commander on the spot, the acceptance by other United Nations participating of a unified command and the association of any forces given by those nations with that command, would be as a result of a United Nations decision.

We have made it abundantly clear in Washington that if Canada is to help, it must be help to the United Nations, fulfilling our obligations under the Charter, and not help to the United States; also that the United Nations character of the whole operation must be emphasized and formalized. There is no disposition to quarrel with this in Washington or in London or, indeed, in any other quarter that we have explored.

The great danger, as I see it, is not so much that the Russians may use the Korean situation to provoke a general war (I do not think they will do this), but that either United Nations intervention will be ineffective in South Korea or (and this is more likely) it will result in a situation not unlike that which persisted in Spain during the civil war, with two Korean forces facing each other, backed by the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. respectively. The U.S.S.R. may assist the North Koreans to the point where they cannot be decisively defeated in the field, and the U.S.A. may do the same for the South Koreans. This may result in a prolonged indecisive conflict which would be a drain on United States resources. The U.S.S.R. would have every reason to be happy if the United States became heavily, but indecisively, engaged in Korea, while the French were deeply involved in Indo-China and the British pre-occupied with Malaya.

There is, of course, another danger that I have not mentioned above, namely, that United States action may prove decisive, and that public opinion in that country will then insist that United Nations forces move beyond the 38th parallel and clean up the whole of the Korean situation. In that case, there may be an unhappy conflict between United States policy and United Nations policy. The latter is pledged merely to defeat an aggression and not, as I understand it, to change the political situation in Korea. Of course, some such change is bound to take place, as a result of developments of the last week. I do not see how there can be a return to the status quo. Either the communists make good their claim to all of Korea, or the United Nations will have to do something to strengthen the position of democratic forces under a better government than that of Syngman Rhee. One reason why we should be careful in not going too far in insisting on the United Nations character of the operation is that when the war is over, the United States may wish to continue United Nations responsibility for the control and government of Korea, in a way which we may not be able to support.

The whole picture, as is clear from even this short analysis, is explosive and dangerous, and it is too early to draw conclusions one way or the other about the eventual political or military result.

PROPOSED SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION ON KOREA

1. Hickerson showed me this morning a draft resolution prepared by the State Department which covers the same ground as the Canadian draft although in somewhat different language. He said that as yet this had been shown to the representative of no other Government. It has been almost completely cleared here except for the approval of the Secretary of State himself. Jessup is taking it to Mr. Acheson at Mr. Acheson's country place this morning. Hickerson emphasized that in view of this we should treat the information he gave me with great discretion. He was unable to give me a copy but allowed me to take notes, and I give below a summary of the less important parts of the resolution and the full text of the key paragraphs.

2. After a brief preamble referring to the Security Council's finding that a breach of the peace has taken place and its recommendation that all members should assist in restoring peace and security in the area of Korea, the resolution is divided into eight sub-paragraphs, the last two of which are tentative and contingent. By them the Security Council:

(1) WELCOMES the prompt and vigorous support offered by members of the United Nations to the republic of Korea;

(2) NOTES that members of the United Nations have transmitted to the United Nations offers of assistance for the republic of Korea;

(3) "RECOMMENDS that all members providing military forces and other assistance pursuant to the aforesaid Security Council resolutions make such forces and other assistance available to a unified command under the United States";

(4) "REQUESTS the United States to designate the commander of such forces";

(5) "AUTHORIZES the unified command and the armed forces of members under it to use the United Nations flag in addition to their own";

(6) "REQUESTS the United States to provide the Security Council with periodic reports on the course of action taken under the unified command". The tentative paragraphs would provide as follows:

(7) A Security Council Committee would be established composed of an unstated number of members of the Council appointed by President. The Committee would

(a) receive offers of assistance for Korea, communicate them to the unified command, and inform the republic of Korea;

(b) receive the reports requested in paragraph 6; and

(c) advise the Security Council concerning the action taken by members in support of its resolutions. Under paragraph 8 the Security Council would request the Secretary-General to act as rapporteur of this Committee.

3. The State Department is not anxious that a Special Committee should be established and has been informed by the British Embassy that the Foreign Office takes a similar view. If, however, there is a demand among other members of the Security Council, they would probably support something on these lines. Hickerson thinks that there might be five members of the Committee. He told me in strict confidence that Lie had suggested that he himself be named as rapporteur so that he could bypass Zintchenko.

4. They hope that the Security Council might meet tomorrow afternoon to adopt this resolution, although he thinks some delay may be necessary so that the members of the Council can receive instructions after the resolution has been privately circulated. They would like it to be moved by the United Kingdom or some other friendly delegation. He considers it unlikely that the Soviet representative will return to the Council and apply a veto.

5. He said that they might themselves desire to amend the text shown me and promised to keep me informed. He doubts whether he will have anything further to say to me before tomorrow morning. In the meantime I should be glad to learn whether you are satisfied with the text either with or without paragraphs 7 and 8. It seems to me that it gets around our difficulties.

PROPOSED SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION ON KOREA

Following for Wrong from Heeney, Begins: The Minister spoke to you on the telephone yesterday afternoon concerning the proposals described in your WA-1473 of July 4. He indicated then that in general a resolution of the character of that under discussion in Washington would be satisfactory from our point of view.

2. However, as Mr. Pearson said to you, the phrase "under the United States" contained in paragraph 2 (3) of your message is objectionable to us. Nor can we see that it adds anything whatever of value to the United States. If under (4) the United States designates the commander of the forces employed, surely that is all they can want.

3. Further, as Mr. Pearson said, "the United States" appears more often than is necessary in the resolution, although we all agree that the purpose of the resolution is to play up the United Nations aspect of the Korean operations.

4. There are other verbal points in the resolution which we might make, but we are not anxious to press them. In any event, they are not of great importance and we take it that final drafting will be accomplished in New York.

5. I think I should add, however, that the Prime Minister himself wishes it to be quite clear that the Government attaches the greatest importance to the United Nations auspices for any action by Canadian forces in connection with Korea. You will have noticed the careful phrasing which he used in his statement in the House of Commons on June 30, when he said: "If we are informed that a Canadian contribution to aid United Nations operations under a United Nations commander would be important to achieve the ends of peace ... then the Government wishes Parliament to know that it would immediately consider making such a contribution." Mr. St. Laurent went on to give a specific undertaking that if action by Canada, other than that which he had described, be contemplated, Parliament would immediately be summoned to give the new situation consideration.

6. You will appreciate that, in view of this declaration, the Prime Minister would be obliged to have Parliament called before Canadian forces could be made available in connection with Korea under anything other than United Nations command.

7. I am sending you separate messages letting you have our views concerning the proposal for a Korean Committee of the Security Council and the applicable provisions of the Charter.

RE PROPOSED SECURITY COUNCIL COMMITTEE ON KOREA

Following for Wrong from Heeney, Begins: The Minister in his telephone conversation with you yesterday has already told you of his views of the proposal referred to in your WA-1473 of July 4th.

2. Mr. Pearson feels that a Committee of the character referred to in paragraph 2 (7) of your message would be open to practical objection and would be unnecessary from our point of view, at least in present circumstances. He is inclined to think that the functions of liaison proposed for the Committee could be adequately discharged by having the Secretary-General himself named for the purpose in the Security Council's Resolution.

3. We would not, I suppose, wish to oppose directly any general view that a Committee should be set up; on the other hand we are inclined to hope that the proposal is not put forward, particularly so if the membership were to extend beyond those making actual contributions to the Korean operations. KOREA

Cordier telephoned me this morning to say that he would like to have the Canadian views today on the draft resolution which, he said, was being "passed around". He gave me the gist of this resolution which seemed to me identical with the resolution mentioned by Mr. Wrong in paragraph 2 of his WA-1473. The tentative paragraphs concerning a Security Council Committee were omitted. Cordier added, however, that the idea of a Committee of the Security Council had been "floating around". He had not found very much enthusiasm for it. There was the problem of membership and the problem of functions. The latter problem seemed to be clearing up sooner than the former. There were two ideas about a Committee — one that it should consist of the members of the Security Council; the other that it should include the major contributors. I told him that I had had some talk with you on this subject and that I thought you considered the idea of a Committee consisting of contributors would lead to conflict and confusion.

2. After consultation by telephone with LePan, I spoke to Cordier again. I said that we thought the third section of the draft resolution should conclude after the word "command", omitting "under the United States". The reasons for our views were two. In the first place, as the whole purpose of this resolution was to stress the United Nations character of the operation, we thought it best in principle to reduce the number of references to the United States. In the second place, we thought the United States' substantive point was met sufficiently in the next paragraph. Cordier indicated agreement with our views on this matter.

3. I said that we would also prefer that the sixth section of the draft resolution be altered to request the commander to provide reports to the Security Council. Cordier said that for strictly constitutional reasons they had the same preference as we. As I would understand, however, there was the problem of personality involved, and he was inclined to make concessions for this reason. They did not want to create a situation in which there would be two bosses. He suggested that the difficulty might be overcome by requesting the commander "through the United States" to provide reports. He wondered also if the situation might be covered by the fourth section according to which the United States would designate the commander. It might be that the designation implied that the commander would report back through the United States.

4. I told Cordier further that on the whole we thought it better not to set up a Committee at this time.

5. Cordier said that they were still hoping to have a Council meeting on Thursday, but it might be postponed until Friday if necessary, in order to make sure that agreement is reached on the question of command. He is engaged in sounding out various delegations on this draft.

6. I reported my conversations with Cordier immediately to Mr. Wrong by telephone so that he would know the state of developments at this end.

Following for Holmes from Heeney, Begins: Your telegram No. 443 of the 5th of July: Proposed Security Council resolution on Korea.

As LePan told Carter over the telephone this afternoon, there is one further comment which we would like you to pass on to Cordier in addition to those mentioned in paragraph 2 of your telegram under reference.

2. In paragraph 2 of Wrong's teletype 1473 of the 4th of July, he indicated that under the draft United States resolution all members of the United Nations will be recommended "to assist in restoring peace and security in the area of Korea". We are nervous about the phrase "in the area of Korea" and feel strongly that it should be replaced simply by "Korea". You will be aware that on previous occasions the United States Government has given a very broad interpretation to similar phrases which have included the formula, "in the area of". We would not wish the resolution to contain anything which would suggest that we are in any way involved in the decision of the United States Government to defend Formosa. We regard the order of President Truman to the Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack on Formosa as a decision taken by the United States Government alone and on its own authority. It does not flow in any way from a decision by the United Nations. As a member of the United Nations we have a responsibility, pursuant to the resolutions of the Security Council of the 25th and 27th of June, to assist, so far as we are able, in the defence of Korea. We have no (repeat no) such responsibility to assist in the defence of Formosa. In order to prevent this distinction from becoming obscured we should like the phrase "in the area of Korea" struck out; and we should be grateful if you would let Cordier know of our views on this point at once. Following for Wrong from Heeney, Begins: We have been disturbed here by the possibility that it may be very difficult to maintain the distinction between the action which the United States is taking on its own authority for the defence of Formosa and the action which it is taking under the auspices of the United Nations for the defence of Korea. Although we are willing to do our share towards the defence of Korea, as soon as the Security Council has given a clear mandate to a United States officer for operations there, we do not wish to become involved in the defence of Formosa. We also feel that there will be more chance of maintaining the high degree of unanimity which has already been attained in the United Nations over the defence of Korea, if the extent of the United Nations responsibility is clearly defined.

2. The possibility of confusion between the defence of Korea and the defence of Formosa is heightened, in our view, by the fact that General MacArthur, if we understand the situation correctly, has command over the Seventh Fleet for operational purposes, although administratively it comes under Admiral Radford's headquarters in Hawaii. An example or two might illustrate the possible situations which we have in mind. It is conceivable that MacArthur, with responsibility for the defence of both Korea and Formosa, might be tempted to use naval vessels, entrusted by other countries to his command, for purposes which were more closely related to the operations around Formosa than to the defence of Korea and might, in this way, involve those countries, without their consent, (and indeed, even the United Nations as a whole) in United States initiatives in other areas. Or such involvement might occur as the result of another set of circumstances. A ship of the United States Navy, flying the flag of the United Nations as well as of the United States, might be fired on by Chinese Communists when it was far distant from Korea. If this were to happen, it would almost certainly be alleged that the United Nations had been attacked and that all members of the United Nations were involved in the incident.

3. Whatever you may think of these hypothetical examples, you will agree, I imagine, that, unless action is taken in advance, it will be difficult to draw a clear line between the Korean operations and operations in defence of Formosa. Moreover, the Government of Nationalist China will have a vested interest in blurring the distinction. We have therefore been wondering whether it would not be wise for the Security Council to include in the resolution that is to be passed tomorrow a territorial demarcation of the area around Korea in which United States forces and the forces of other members of the United Nations will be acting under United Nations auspices.

4. The difficulties of such a demarcation, of course, would be considerable. We are inclined to think here, however, that they would not be insuperable. The kind of territorial delimitation that we are thinking of would mark out an area which might run as far north as the 40th parallel, as far south as the 32nd parallel, and which might be bounded on the west by a line running midway down Korea Bay and the Yellow Sea. In our view, there would be no need for the eastern boundary of the area to be drawn so closely to Korea. It might even extend far enough to the east to include MacArthur's headquarters. The important point would be to exclude the whole of Communist China from the area in which operations under the United Nations would be undertaken.

5. Such a territorial delimitation, we think, would have the advantage not only of lessening the danger of members of the United Nations becoming involved in incidents with Chinese forces outside Korea, but also of establishing a framework in which the conflict in Korea might be localized. If we understand United States policy in this general area correctly, they are anxious to localize and isolate the fighting in Korea and also to sterilize the conflict between Chiang Kai-Shek and Peking. Such a plan as we are thinking of would thus seem to be in accordance with their approach. We are therefore wondering whether it might not prove attractive to them and whether they might not be willing to sponsor in the Security Council such a territorial delimitation of the area round Korea in which forces would be acting under the aegis of the United Nations.

6. I should be grateful to have, as quickly as possible, your reactions to this proposal. Ends.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: Your EX-1081 of July 6th. Korea.

1. The following are my immediate comments on the suggestion that there be added to the Security Council resolution to be considered tomorrow a territorial definition of the area in which the forces placed under unified command in Korea can act under United Nations auspices:

(1) I have heard no suggestion from any source since the President's statement of June 27th that the insulation of Formosa by the United States Navy from attack from the mainland is considered other than a purely United States operation equally as distinct from the Korean venture as the announcement at the same time of accelerated United States military assistance to Indo China and the Philippines. I have detected no confusion on this point in discussions with the State Department and in public comment on the President's decisions. After all, the nearest points of Formosa and Korea are a good 700 miles apart.

(2) I consider it impossible at this late stage to secure an addition of such importance to the draft resolution, which is being put into final form this afternoon at discussions between friendly delegations in New York. I am sure that some members of the Security Council, if it were put forward by the United States, would insist on referring it to their own Governments. Furthermore, even if the United States were ready to entertain this proposal, the Joint Chiefs of Staff would almost certainly wish to secure MacArthur's concurrence before agreeing on any definite demarcation.

(3) Could not the matter be dealt with by means other than a Security Council resolution, perhaps by a directive to MacArthur on the uses to which he could put the naval forces of other members of the United Nations and also by a Canadian order to the senior officer of the Canadian Naval units delimiting the general region within which he is authorized to operate under the unified command? If Security Council action were agreed after consultation with the other Governments concerned, there would be time for another resolution before our ships can reach Korean waters.

2. I have not discussed this proposal with the State Department as I am sure it would be poorly received at this stage and not lead to our wishes being met. I think that it would be interpreted by the United States Government as implying some lack of confidence in their good faith and in the sincerity of their most genuine desire that the Korean operations should be under the aegis of the United Nations. 1. Following LePan's telephone conversation with Carter and the subsequent conversation on this subject which I had on the telephone with Mr. Pearson, we communicated with the United Kingdom delegation to find out exactly how the preamble was worded. The delegation pointed out that the preamble to the draft resolution did no more than repeat the text of the Security Council Resolution of June 27th, the relevant portion of the draft of the preamble being "having recommended that the members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area".

2. I spoke to Cordier about your anxieties on this matter. He admitted that this "could be a problem", although he believed there was a firm understanding at the time the resolution was passed that it was intended to apply to Korea only. He was about to go to a meeting, but told me that he would look into this question as soon as possible and let me know if anything could be done.

3. Subsequently I spoke to Jebb on the subject. Jebb recognized the difficulty but thought that in view of the clear understanding of the meaning of the resolution, we were unnecessarily concerned over possible complications. He stressed the fact that the draft resolution did no more than "the previous resolution" which had already been accepted.

4. I also talked to the acting Australian representative, Shann. He told me that the Australian Ambassador in Washington had been making representations to the State Department against the proposal that the Security Council should directly appoint the United States as its agent, and that they too had objected to the phrase "under the United States" in the third paragraph. He implied, however, that they had met with no success and reconciled themselves to the draft resolution. He recognized the ambiguity in the reference to the area of Korea and thought that his Government like ours would not wish to be committed in this way to supporting United States policy in general in the Far East. He was going to discuss this aspect of things with Canberra.

5. It seems to me that in view of the fact that the preamble is a direct quotation from the Security Council resolution, we could hardly ask that it be altered, and therefore that if we wish to remove the possible ambiguity, it would be advisable to seek some other means of doing so. Ends.

3. As bad news comes in from Korea, a feeling of uneasiness is developing that the United States, whose action at the beginning was universally applauded, has been caught completely by surprise and is not in a position to take sufficiently effective action after recovery from that surprise. It is recalled that the United States had indicated that Korea was not a first line of defence any more than Formosa was. In the event, however, the United States took up the challenge, quite rightly and very speedily, but without resources to meet it, at least immediately. There is also uneasiness, which is certainly shared in the Department, that the Administration may become involved with Communist China as a result of its decision to neutralize Formosa. As you know, the Communists in China have taken up this challenge, as they call it and it has given them a superficial case for assisting the North Koreans. Furthermore, excited and emotional statements in Congress and elsewhere, especially the suggestion that an atom bomb should be dropped on North Korea, does not strengthen confidence here that the United States people will be able to face the problems ahead with steadiness and determination. I agree that, as the situation deteriorates in the field, with Americans alone fighting, they will become somewhat impatient with formal insistence on the United Nations character of the operations. However, if we are to keep this country united, and if we are to limit our intervention to Korea alone, which is our only obligation in the present circumstances, we must continue to emphasize, at every appropriate occasion, that we are participating solely in a United Nations operation and that that operation is solely for the defence of Korea. If the Americans get irritated over this, that will be unfortunate, but unavoidable. If they express that irritation, which I hope they will not, there will be, I am afraid, a quick reaction in the press here, reminding them that Canadians, and other countries of the Commonwealth, have had experience in the past of fighting rear-guard actions against superior forces without United States armed support. We must do all we can on both sides to avoid this kind of thing developing. I think that they could help in Washington if the President or the Secretary of State would make a strong statement to the effect that they also are concerned only with United Nations action in Korea, and that if the Chinese Communists become involved, it will be entirely on their own responsibility and not as the result of any provocation on Washington's part; that the statement about Formosa was meant merely to neutralize that island and to prevent it becoming implicated in the Korean situation. I know that both the British and the French are disturbed over the possibility of Korean developments spreading to China.

4. I hope also that there will be no public and official appeals from Washington for assistance; at least to those countries which fought throughout World War II, and, especially, to those who have already made contributions to the Korean conflict. General Bradley's mysterious reference to offers of land forces — couched in such vague terms — has already caused much speculation and some embarrassment here.

In this connection I have been advised that there is an urgent need for additional effective assistance. I should be grateful, therefore, if your Government would examine its capacity to provide an increased volume of combat forces, particularly ground forces. Offers of military assistance should be communicated to the Secretary-General in terms leaving detailed arrangements for subsequent agreements between your Government and the Unified Command (USG)

TELEGRAM WA-1544 Washington, July 15, 1950

PERSONAL AND SECRET

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: Your message EX-1118 of July 13th and our telephone conversation of the same date.

1. When seeing Hickerson yesterday afternoon I took up with him some points mentioned in your message and in our discussion. In particular, I told him that I was thinking of approaching the Secretary of State to see whether he or the President would consider making a further statement clearly separating the action in Korea from the neutralization of Formosa and defining the position along the lines suggested at the end of paragraph 3 of your message. He expressed much interest in this suggestion and said that he would be glad himself to discuss it with Mr. Acheson and to give him some of the background which led you to advance it. I asked him to do this and to tell Mr. Acheson that I had been thinking of approaching him myself and would be glad to talk the matter over with him if he thought it would be profitable.

2. I also mentioned the suggestion made by Senator Ferguson[24] that Romulo might be appointed Deputy Commander to MacArthur. Hickerson agreed with me that this would be most undesirable. He is himself seeing Senator Ferguson immediately "to put him right". I went on to observe, making clear that this was a personal idea of my own, that if the structure of the field command were changed in some important respects, such as by the appointment of Deputy Commanders from other countries, it seemed to me that the Governments which were making forces available in the field should have some say in the matter and that possibly some arrangements might be required in Washington to permit consultation between these Governments on such matters.

3. I then asked him whether any other countries had as yet offered to contribute ground forces. He said he knew of no offer other than the rejected one from Chiang Kai Shek, but the United States Government was very anxious that such offers should be made as the public questioning on the share of the load carried by the United States was growing intense. He illustrated by remarking that they would welcome even quite impossible offers such as a camel corps from Yemen. I urged that any appeals for further material assistance should come from the United Nations and not from the United States Government no matter how intense the public pressure might grow, and he appeared fully to agree with this. At the time neither of us knew that the Secretary- General's telegrams of yesterday had already been despatched, but Hickerson was aware that some such action was impending.

[24] Sénateur Homer Ferguson (républicain), Michigan.
Senator Homer Ferguson, (Republican) Michigan.

4. Our conversation covered a wide field and I am reporting in other messages on other questions which arose. The points touched on in this message are matters dealt with in your personal telegram and in our conversations. Ends.

KOREA

1. I have had a word with Cordier concerning the Secretary-General's message yesterday. I told him that you had been upset by this message, and that you considered that it was inappropriate to hear a message of this kind for the first time from press reports of the Secretary-General's press conference, and secondly that a step like this ought not to have been taken without consultation at least with the countries which might be expected to contribute and would therefore be most embarrassed by the message. I referred to the fact that he had mentioned this possibility to me the afternoon before, but said that I had no idea that this proposal was under urgent consideration at the time. I explained to him the very difficult position in which it put the Canadian Government and said that it did not help in securing the best response from Canadians. Cordier accepted this criticism and recognized that things had not been done in the best possible way. He said that he was afraid that things in Korea might have forced their hands into acting precipitately. (In this connection I might say that the New York Press throughout yesterday was filled with panicky headlines about the breaching of the Kum river, and at both New York and Lake Success there was a feeling that unless some drastic steps were taken there might be an immediate disaster). Cordier went on to say tactfully that the Secretariat were getting into a very serious problem. He first implied that heavy pressure was being put upon the Secretary-General to secure more help. Then he added: "Well, perhaps I shouldn't say pressure." He said that they had stayed up most of Thursday night into Friday morning working on particulars about the proper machinery. They thought that they had reached the desired formula and intended sending out the messages first thing Friday morning. In the morning, however, they encountered new problems and the message was delayed. Their intention had been that the message would reach Governments before the Secretary-General mentioned it. I gathered that in the excitement they did not take care to see that the messages had been sent out before the Secretary-General spoke.

Cordier did not admit that a mistake had been made, but I assume that he would not want to say anything which implied criticism of Mr. Lie. He indicated that they would certainly bear in mind our views when taking any future action. I went on to say that there was no lack of appreciation in Ottawa of the serious nature of the situation and understanding of the state of public opinion in the United States. Even though we understood these problems we were anxious that steps should not be taken under pressure which would make cooperation more difficult and fail to take into consideration public opinion in other countries. Cordier said he quite understood our point of view.

2. As I have reported to Mr. Heeney by telephone, your views on the Secretary-General's message are shared by delegates of other countries in New York. Neither the United Kingdom nor the Australian delegation had any advance word of this message. This morning I talked with Nisot of the Belgian delegation who was very upset about it and deplored the fact that it had been sent without consultation. I have not been able to get in touch with Jebb, but I had several talks with Laskey of the United Kingdom. He said that they had had no response from London as yet. He learned several days ago from a member of the United States delegation of the meeting on Monday which Mr. Lie had with Austin, [Arne] Sunde,[25] and the Korean Ambassador,[26] to which Lie referred at his press conference (see my teletype No. 472 of today's date†). All they had been told, however, was that the meeting considered some of the problems of a unified command, discussed the possibility of United Nations machinery to handle such things as relief supplies, and the offers of non-military assistance, but had come to no conclusion. Neither Laskey nor I has yet been able to find out whether Sunde was involved in the later meeting in which a decision was taken to send a message with reference to ground troops. This meeting, according to what Cordier told me and what I have learned from other sources, began Thursday evening and lasted into Friday morning.

3. When I raised with Laskey the question of whether it was appropriate for the Secretary-General to issue this request for further assistance or whether this ought not to have been left to the Security Council, Laskey said that Hyde of the United States delegation had told him yesterday that the Americans were concerned over the security aspect. They did not want a debate in the Security Council in which the Yugoslavs and others might take part. On these grounds he explained the fact that the Secretary-General had in his letter asked that offers of military assistance be communicated to the Secretary-General "in general terms, leaving detailed arrangements for agreement between Governments and the unified command". The United Nations did not want to be involved in military discussions which should remain secret. Laskey pointed out that although the idea of a United Nations committee had so far been rejected, it appeared that the Secretary-General was constituting a kind of informal committee for his purposes, consisting of representatives of the United States, Korea, the Secretariat, and the present Chairman of the Council.

TOP SECRET Ottawa, July 18, 1950

KOREA: THE U.N. SECRETARY-GENERAL'S LETTER OF JULY 14

Attached is a copy of the Secretary-General's letter of July 14 urging further assistance.† It is felt you may wish to have some comments.

2. Serious as is the Korean situation, and important as it is that we should not fail in our responsibility as a member of the United Nations, it would seem, at least as yet, that Korea is but a "side show" in the over-all struggle between the U.S.S.R. and the Western world. There is no reason to believe that Western Europe is not still the main theatre, and it would be unfortunate if our attention should be diverted from Europe by reason of Korea. It is suggested therefore that any Canadian contribution should not be at the expense of our capacity to fulfil our responsibilities for the direct defence of Canada and under the North Atlantic Treaty. Indeed, the Korean incident stresses the need for stepping up Canadian defence preparations and the whole North Atlantic programme. It is suggested therefore that in any public statement about the Secretary-General's request an effort should be made to place the Korean incident in this wider setting.

3. It will be observed that the Secretary-General's letter notes "there is immediate need for additional effective assistance," and requests that the Government "examine its capacity to provide an increased volume of combat forces, particularly ground forces." Although "additional effective assistance" might include assistance other than combat forces, this distinction probably will not be evident to the general public, whether in this country or elsewhere. It would seem difficult therefore for the Government to avoid answering the request for combat forces in a communication which can be made public.

4. The Minister of National Defence will report to Cabinet on the availability of Canadian combat forces for Korea. His report will take into account the needs for the direct defence of Canada and our responsibilities under the North Atlantic Treaty. It is assumed that even if the Government were willing to despatch ground forces there are none presently available.

5. It would, however, seem undesirable to give a flat refusal to the Secretary-General's request, since such a reply would inevitably react unfavourably on U.S. opinion and probably on opinion throughout most of Canada. The Government, therefore, will probably wish to consider what assistance other than ground forces might be provided. The following courses might be considered as possible alternatives or in combination:

(1) The provision of other than ground forces; e.g., additional naval units or combat air units. The report from National Defence will no doubt examine this possibility. It is thought, however, that the report may indicate no ships presently operational could be properly spared, and that while a small combat air unit could be organized and despatched promptly, the U.S. military authorities would not consider such a force very useful. The Government may however wish to give consideration to the offer of such a force if no offer of ground forces can be made.

(2) Transportation assistance:

The U.S. has chartered some 60 commercial planes belonging to various companies for the air lift, but it is understood that more transport aircraft are seriously needed. The Government may wish to consider offering R.C.A.F. transport aircraft. (It is understood the report from National Defence will consider this possibility.)

It might also be possible for the Government to charter planes from commercial operators and place them at the disposal of the U.S. authorities. Canadian Pacific Air Lines have intimated that if the Australian flights were temporarily suspended, they could probably provide four round trips a week to Tokyo. These planes carry 36 passengers and are "pressurized", and would be specially useful for carrying personnel. It is possible that TCA may also be able to provide a few planes, although we have no information on this point.

The shipping needs of supplying U.S. troops in Korea (and perhaps for evacuating refugees) will obviously be substantial. It is not known whether the U.S. has sufficient shipping immediately available, although they probably can assemble sufficient shipping on reasonably short notice. I am informally advised however that there is abundant Canadian-owned shipping, either under Canadian or U.K. registry, and that Canadian ship owners would be delighted to get dollar cargoes. It is thought, therefore, that the Canadian Government might wish to offer shipping, although this would raise problems of war risk insurance and additional compensation to crews, both of which would probably have to be met by the Canadian Government.

6. An offer of aid by means other than ground combat units is, however, scarcely likely to forestall serious criticism in certain quarters in Canada of the Government's defence policy. It is suggested, therefore, that the reply to the Secretary-General (which presumably will be published) should indicate that while the request for ground forces cannot be complied with at present, in view of our responsibility for the direct defence of Canada and our obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty, the Government is urgently re-examining its defence policy in the light of the current international situation. It would, of course be desirable from the standpoint of allaying public criticism if the Government were prepared to specify what it proposes to do in this regard; e.g., raise the present ceiling on personnel of the three services, step up re-equipment of the services, etc. It is thought that some such measures could be taken without calling Parliament.

In conclusion it is suggested that due weight should be given to the probable reaction in the United States and in United Nations circles if we have to reply that no further combat forces can be made available. There is no doubt the American people feel they are carrying the whole burden of the conflict since they alone are providing ground forces. A flat refusal to assist by combat troops might have serious repercussions.

Attached is a suggested draft statement which the Prime Minister might make following the Cabinet meeting tomorrow.

Projet de déclaration du premier ministre

Draft Statement by Prime Minister

[Ottawa], July 18, 1950

The eruption of the North Korean aggressors into South Korea is a breach in the periphery of the free world. Each of the democratic nations has its role to play. So far as Canada is concerned we have our obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty as a member of the United Nations, we have our responsibilities with the United States for the defence of the North Atlantic continent, we have our responsibilities for home defence. Presented with the Korean crisis, the Canadian Government has, therefore, to estimate with urgency but with cool heads where we can make our weight most effectively felt in the overall defence pattern. This is a decision which calls for priorities in manpower, in expenditure and in mutual aid. The Korean crisis is the most immediate of many demands on the free world. In Korea the struggle has entered into an acute phase and the United Nations has undertaken police action in which Canada is actively cooperating.

But the situation there cannot be viewed in isolation. Indeed it must have a galvanizing effect on the whole defence structure of the free nations. From that point of view, if from no other, the Korean aggression has not served the purposes of Communism, for it has stimulated the tempo of defence measures and has increased the cohesion of resistance to aggressive Communism in other parts of the world. The measures which the United States Government have taken and are taking to put their great country into a posture of defence are far-reaching and significant. Here in Canada we have felt that the Korean crisis is a stimulus and a challenge. We shall press on with measures which will increase the preparedness of this country. We are increasing our defence expenditures. We may have to impose sacrifices upon our people. I do not propose at this time to enlarge further upon the measures which we have in mind for the immediate future. They are designed to make Canada more able both to defend herself and to make her maximum contribution as an ally and as a responsible member of the United Nations in this time of crisis.

Meanwhile, the Government is considering with a sense of the greatest urgency the further steps which can be taken to help out in the Korean operation itself. Our decisions in that sphere should be considered in relation to the other obligations which I have mentioned. We must not overlook in the pressure of events in the Pacific the obligations which we have assumed and must meet in the North Atlantic area and on the North American Continent. These are grave decisions but it is deeply sustaining to know that the well-nigh unanimous weight of Canadian public opinion is behind the Government in its firm intention to fulfil our obligations in these testing times.

KOREA: POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF A UNITED NATIONS VOLUNTEER FORCE

Although it has not yet reached the stage where it can be regarded as a firm proposal, the idea of a United Nations Volunteer Force has recently been receiving the cautious attention of the Secretariat and of the New York press. It was already being worked on by Cordier on July 12, and it has been given some impetus by the Secretary-General's appeal for additional combat forces to assist in the defence of South Korea. In this connection I attach copies of the following papers:

(a) The relevant paragraph of Mr. Riddell's account of his conversation with Cordier on July 12;

(b) An excerpt from paragraph 3 of teletype No. 470 of July 14 from Mr. Holmes;

(c) A copy of an article by A.M. Rosenthal in the New York Times of July 15, which balances the pros and cons of a "Volunteer Legion";†

(Mr. Holmes has subsequently informed us that in his view these accounts, taken together, give a reliable picture of the thinking in the Secretariat on this subject.)

(d) A copy of an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal last night, and which refers somewhat superficially to a United Nations International Force to fight in South Korea.†

2. There are obvious political and administrative drawbacks to the organization and employment of an international force for the purposes of the Korean war. Perhaps the outstanding objection is that it could not possibly be trained, equipped and sent to Korea in time to be effective unless, of course, the war drags on for a considerable period. On the other hand, the idea of an international force under United Nations auspices is of a sort to arouse some public interest, and the attached article in the Ottawa Journal may possibly be a forerunner to somewhat wider support for it in Canada.

3. It seems quite clear that, in view of the caution with which the idea is being handled at Lake Success and of the obvious difficulties of implementing any such plan, the Government is unlikely to be faced in the near future with a firm proposal along these lines. Moreover, there has so far been no indication that groups or individuals in Canada are anxious to join a United Nations force. I suppose it is possible, however, that if the Government should decide against sending ground troops some sporadic public interest in the idea may develop, and I thought you might wish to have this preliminary note in case the subject should be raised in Cabinet tomorrow.

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF A UNITED NATIONS FORCE

A great many offers of voluntary service were being received by the United Nations, according to Cordier. There was, for example, a group of fifty United Kingdom airmen which wished to volunteer for service immediately, and there were similar groups and individuals from other countries. These people did not wish simply to join the United States forces, and there would be obvious disadvantage in having them do so. Some thought will have to be given about ways of using them, and the Secretary-General was turning over in his mind the possibility of establishing a United Nations force, consisting of volunteers. He said there were a good many countries which did not themselves wish to make contributions from their regular forces, but which would not object to their nationals enlisting in a United Nations force. If the U.N. went ahead with this scheme, however, they would wish to be sure that they did not merely recruit the adventurers and soldiers of fortune from the democratic world. They were thinking, therefore, of the possibility of asking Member States to subject volunteers to the regular tests which would be normally applied in their own armed services. Cordier said that they had just begun to think about this problem, and that it had not yet been mentioned to any other delegation. There were many complications, but it seemed to him that the idea might appeal to states which would be troubled about a formal contribution of regular forces.

Cordier was also playing about with the idea of setting up in fact something more like a true United Nations command, which included senior officers from countries other than the United States. He mentioned how much easier things would be if we could build something in the nature of a real United Nations force. I asked him if he was thinking of a force under Article 43. He said, that, of course, a force strictly under Article 43 was not possible, but some kind of mixed force for the present purposes might be organized which could in future become the nucleus of a real United Nations army. I suggested that such a force, although it would be very useful, could hardly be an effective fighting unit in time for action in Korea, and he agreed. I mention these views not because they should be taken too seriously as fixed intentions of the Secretariat, but merely as they indicate certain trends of thinking.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], July 18, 1950

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIR LINES OFFER OF ASSISTANCE IN TRANSPORT TO THE FAR EAST IN CONNECTION WITH THE KOREAN INVASION

Mr. Grant McConachie, President of C.P.A.L., telephoned from Vancouver on July 12 to inquire whether the Canadian Government might wish to make use of C.P.A.L.'s services in moving personnel or material to the Far East in view of the Korean crisis.

2. He noted that the United States Government had chartered about sixty private aircraft to fly personnel and equipment to Korea. Mr. McConachie pointed out that C.P.A.L. was familiar with operating conditions in the Far East. C.P.A.L. planes were better suited to carrying personnel than cargo. They would be particularly good for carrying hospital cases as the cabins are pressurized. Mr. McConachie said that at present they were running two flights a week to Hong Kong via Tokyo.

These were going out nearly empty but were coming back filled mainly with families of Chinese-Canadian citizens. Mr. McConachie said that they could add a third flight a week without difficulty. If they were released by the Air Transport Board from the Australian run they could step service up to a maximum of 4 flights a week. His company was anxious to get more business and he was considering going down to Washington to offer the services of his Line to the United States Government. If he secured a contract with the United States Government he would see that it included a clause permitting it to be terminated if the Canadian Government wished to use C.P.A.L.'s services. However, before doing so he wished to offer them to the Canadian Government.

3. Mr. McConachie was informed that the responsible Ministers were out of town and that no answer could be given him immediately. In the meantime it was hoped that he could delay his visit to Washington. His offer of assistance would be brought to the Minister's attention immediately on his return and he would no doubt wish to discuss it with his colleagues when they were reviewing the Korean situation. Mr. McConachie would be given a reply as soon as possible.

4. This offer from C.P.A.L. should be viewed, I think, from two angles. First, there is the possible embarrassment that might attend a statement by Mr. McConachie to United States defence authorities that he had offered C.P.A.L.'s services to the Canadian Government and they had turned him down. On the other hand, this offer provides an opportunity by which the Canadian Government might, without serious difficulty, increase its offer of assistance to the United Nations in connection with the Korean operations. In view of Canada's geographic position astride the short northern air route to the Far East it would be natural for Canada to offer air transport assistance. C.P.A.L.'s offer might be considered in conjunction with any air transport assistance the R.C.A.F. could provide. T.C.A. [Trans-Canada Airlines] might also have some spare aircraft.

5. If it were decided to accept C.P.A.L.'s offer, the Chief of Air Staff might be requested to discuss the matter with Mr. McConachie and then an offer might be made to the United Nations and the United States Government of such air transport as it was feasible to assemble for this operation.

6. Since the above was dictated we have learned that Mr. McConachie has come to Ottawa and seen Mr. Chevrier who has written to Mr. Claxton about C.P.A.L.'s offer. I understand that Mr. McConachie also plans to see Mr. Howe.

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], July 19, 1950

Present:

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in the Chair,
The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe),
The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton),
The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott),
The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson).

The Secretary (Mr. Wright)
The Acting Military Secretary (W/C Newsome)

The Chief of the General Staff (Lieutenant General Foulkes),
The Chief of the Air Staff (Air Marshal Curtis),
The Acting Chief of the Naval Staff (Rear Admiral Houghton),
The Chairman, Defence Research Board (Dr. Solandt).

The Secretary to the Cabinet (Mr. Robertson),

The Deputy Minister of National Defence (Mr. Drury),
The Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pierce),
The Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance (Mr. Bryce).

I. GENERAL APPRECIATION ON THE IMMINENCE OF WAR

1. The Minister of National Defence reported that the Chiefs of Staff Committee had examined the imminence of a major war arising out of the situation in Korea and elsewhere, and had concluded that:

(a) the risk of a major war being precipitated by the Soviet Union as a direct result of the Korean situation was slight;

(b) the United States' guarantee of the defence of Formosa, together with the Korean situation, created a risk of war between the United States and Communist China, though this in itself need not result in a major war involving the Soviet Union;

(c) the Soviet Union could be expected to continue to exploit and possibly to intensify the exploitation of favourable situations elsewhere. The most probable trouble spots were Hong Kong, Indo-China, Siam, Burma, Malaya, Iran, Greek Macedonia, Yugoslavia, and Berlin. With the possible exception of Yugoslavia, however, it did not seem likely that these situations would lead to direct Soviet intervention and a major war;

(d) although such incidents, together with extensive U.S. involvement in the Far East, would lend weight to the opinions of those who favoured preventive war, no democratic government would be likely to take such a course;

(e) the likelihood that the Soviet Union would precipitate a major war was not considered to be significantly changed by the Korean war. This risk would increase when the Soviet Union:

(i) had what it considered to be an adequate stock-pile of atomic bombs; and,

(ii) had considerably strengthened several branches of its armed forces and also augmented its economic potential.

The dates at which these events would occur were unknown but it was considered that they were unlikely at least during 1950;

(f) the Korean incident indicated an increased willingness on both sides to take risks involving the possibility of war and that the risk of a major war was correspondingly greater; and

(g) while it was possible that the Soviet Union did not intentionally arrange the Korean campaign for the purpose of involving the immediately available reserves of the Western Powers, they would realize that this had been accomplished and would do everything possible to extend this process, perhaps to the extent of producing other incidents in areas where they could exploit the apparent military weaknesses of the Western Powers. This situation seriously affected our position in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, where we were partners with the United States in the role of reinforcing any of the areas under attack. It was obvious that the more U.S. troops that became involved in Korea, the less there would be available for immediate reinforcement of Western Europe, unless steps were taken to create a new reserve by mobilization of the National Guard or other reserves. Even if this course were followed, there would be a very dangerous gap between the time the majority of the regular forces left the United States and the time the reserves would be trained to replace them.

2. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that he thought the risk of a major war as a direct result of the Korean situation was somewhat greater than slight, the word used to describe it in the first paragraph of the paper.

3. The Committee, after further discussion, noted the views of the Chiefs of Staff on the imminence of a major war, as reported by the Minister of National Defence.

II. THE KOREAN SITUATION; AVAILABILITY AND DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN ALLIED MILITARY FORCES

4. The Chief of the General Staff said that it was anticipated that the U.S. forces now engaged in Korea would be driven back to the southern tip of the peninsula to the Pusan area. There were differences of opinion as to whether the U.S. forces would be capable of holding the bridge-head in Korea. If the North Korean forces were unsuccessful in their attempt to drive the United States out of Korea, they would probably contain the U.S. bridge-head by the deployment of the minimum forces required. Meanwhile they would be in a position to withdraw the majority of their forces to the hill country, where they could be re-organized, re-equipped and re-grouped, protected (to a great extent) from U.S. air attack.

General MacArthur had estimated that it would require some four divisions, in addition to the two already committed, to drive the North Koreans back to the 38th parallel. To assemble and organize a force of this size would require two or three months, by which time the weather would be more favourable to the U.S. forces.

General MacArthur had reported that the equipment, including armour and guns, of the North Korean forces was of a very good type and calibre. The North Koreans had demonstrated their skill in the employment of armour under conditions which were not ideally suited to this type of operation. General MacArthur had also acknowledged the high qualities of the infantry soldier. At the commencement of the operations, the North Korean Army had available some three hundred tanks of a type equal if not superior to the present equipment of the U.S. Armed Forces.

5. General Foulkes then outlined the present position with regard to the availability and disposition of the military forces of certain allied countries and concluded that if the situation in Korea were to be dealt with satisfactorily, the major portion of the United Nations field force in Korea would have to be provided by the United States. Because of other commitments, geographical position or lack of strength, little assistance could be expected from European or Commonwealth countries.

In these circumstances, it seemed certain that the United States would resort immediately to some form of mobilization. Since it would take from six months to a year to equip and train any reserve forces which might be mobilized, and since the greater part of available U.S. ground forces would be committed in Korea or elsewhere, the period between this autumn and the next appeared to be the most critical.

6. The Minister of National Defence mentioned that the repatriation of some seventy thousand Dutch troops from Indonesia would be completed this fall. It was hoped that some means could be found to replace the equipment which these forces had been required to turn over to Indonesia on repatriation.

7. The Prime Minister observed that the re-equipping of these troops would strengthen the defences of Western Europe and enquired as to whether any suitable equipment could be made available to them by their North Atlantic partners.[27]

8. General Foulkes said that the Dutch had trained on and would probably adhere to U.K. equipment, of which the U.S. had no stocks. The U.K. had already made available as much of their equipment as they considered possible to their allies. The possibility of providing the Dutch with Canadian equipment of U.K. pattern was being explored with the thought that it might be possible to arrange with the U.S. to replace from U.S. sources a proportion of Canadian stocks thus made available. As yet the Dutch had not been approached on this matter.

9. The Committee, after further discussion, noted the report of the Chief of the General Staff on the Korean situation and on the availability and disposition of certain allied forces.

III. POSSIBILITIES OF CANADIAN ASSISTANCE TO THE UNITED NATIONS FORCES IN KOREA

10. The Minister of National Defence reported that the possibilities of providing Canadian assistance to the United Nations forces in Korea had been discussed with the Chiefs of Staff Committee, who recommended as follows:

(a) Royal Canadian Navy

Since there were no indications of a need for further Canadian Naval assistance beyond the three destroyers already despatched, it was recommended that no further assistance be offered. After about six months, it would be necessary to bring back the three destroyers and replace them in rotation with fresh ships.

(b) Canadian Army

No authoritative request had been received for despatch of Canadian ground forces; and no such assistance was recommended. Canadian ground forces despatched in the immediate future would have to incorporate the Mobile Striking Force, which was the only Canadian ground force available for the defence of North America. All Army formations were under strength and despatch of any of these would lag by four to six months, the time it would take to bring the formations, plus their first-line reserves, up to strength.

(c) Royal Canadian Air Force

Enquiries had been received as to the availability of long-range air transport; and it was known that there was a pressing need for such assistance. It was therefore recommended that Canada offer to provide a squadron of North Star aircraft to operate between the United States and Japan in support of the U.S. forces. The R.C.A.F. estimated that five North Stars could be made available for operations from U.S. bases within thirty-six hours of instructions being issued; a sixth North Star could be made available in two weeks; and four more North Stars within two or three months, bringing the total to ten.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

11. The Prime Minister observed that it was unfortunate that U.S. Naval units were visiting Quebec at this time. From the public standpoint, this did not strengthen the impression that Canadian Naval assistance was required by the U.N. forces in Korea.

12. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that this raised a reciprocal question with regard to the European cruise planned by the R.C.N. this autumn. Should this exercise be carried out, it would be well to emphasize its training value rather than its good-will aspects.

13. Mr. Claxton said that there would be no difficulty in justifying the cruise as the ships would be training within the North Atlantic area, where the R.C.N. had its primary role.

14. Mr. St-Laurent deprecated the action taken by the Secretary-General in requesting military assistance from U.N. member nations. He had acted largely on his own authority on a question which was the concern of the Security Council and of the member nations which were likely to contribute forces. Our strong objections to the procedure followed in this instance should be made known in the appropriate quarters.

15. Mr. Pearson reported that action as suggested by the Prime Minister had been taken. There were indications, however, that the Secretary-General was not entirely to blame in this case since he had been subjected to intense pressure from the U.S. State Department.

16. The Chief of the General Staff mentioned that the Chairman of the Canadian Joint Staff, Washington, had learned that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff had not been consulted in this matter; nor were they clear as to how the ground forces of the other nations would be integrated into General MacArthur's organization. In this connection, it seemed likely that the most useful form of assistance would be, say, a Commonwealth division which could function as a self-contained unit with its own supply lines.

17. Mr. Pearson enquired as to the possibility of forming some kind of an international United Nations force which would consist of volunteers from the member nations.

18. General Foulkes said that, on the basis of experience during the last war, it would be difficult from the military point of view to bring troops of different nations together to form a satisfactory composite force. The problem of different languages was but one of a number of obstacles which would have to be overcome.

19. Mr. Pearson asked whether consideration had been given to the possibility of Canada providing assistance in the form of a Field Ambulance unit.

20. General Foulkes said that, if a Field Ambulance unit were to be provided, this might be done more appropriately under the auspices of the Red Cross. If this form of assistance were to be supplied, it might be well to consider offering to man a field hospital.

21. The Committee, after further discussion, noted with approval the recommendations of the Chiefs of Staff with regard to Canadian assistance to the United Nations forces in Korea.

IV. ACCELERATION OF CANADIAN DEFENCE PROGRAMME

22. The Minister of National Defence said that the Korean situation disclosed the grave military weakness of the North Atlantic countries. In this connection the Chiefs of Staff had prepared a number of proposals for accelerating the Canadian defence programme. Most of these involved acceleration of plans already made rather than new departures and would serve to increase our effective operational strength. This would in turn increase the collective strength of the North Atlantic members and put Canadian forces in a better position to make a further contribution to Korea if this were considered desirable at a later date.

Proposals for the Navy included the commissioning of two destroyers and two Algerine minesweepers at present in reserve; the rearming of our tribal class destroyers; provision for seaward defences; the improvement and modernization of communication equipment; the acquisition of maintenance stores required for additional ships in commission; additional personnel for the operation of destroyers and other increased activities; and a number of other related matters. Over and above this, approximately $4 million would be required for expenses in conjunction with the three destroyers already despatched to Korea.

23. Mr. Claxton said that, with respect to the proposed purchase of twelve additional Sea Fury aircraft, this project required closer examination.

Proposals for the Army included bringing the brigade group up to strength and provision of limited anti-aircraft defence.

24. Mr. Claxton observed that the Army was in a transitional period and there were few new types of equipment that it would be economical or wise for us to buy at the present time.

The proposals for the Air Force included acceleration of the F86 production programme from five to seven per month and of the CF100 programme from three to five per month, so as to provide sufficient fighter aircraft for a progressive build-up to three F86 squadrons of twenty-five aircraft each by July, 1952, and two CF100 all-weather fighter squadrons of eighteen aircraft each by December 1952. In order to increase the fighter strength of the Air Force pending the production of suitable numbers of new fighter aircraft, it was proposed that 100 Mustangs, together with a three-year supply of spares, be purchased immediately from the U.S.A.F. These aircraft could be purchased economically and, while they were obsolescent, they had proved extremely valuable in Exercise Sweetbriar and in Korea. They were rugged long-range aircraft which it was considered would continue to be useful for some time.

The production facilities for the Orenda engine would be enlarged to allow an increase in the production rate from twenty to fifty engines per month. It was recommended that the construction of the radar net be accelerated so as to provide for additional stations sooner than planned.

Additional personnel would be required to provide for the increase in operational elements and the necessary logistic support.

The total additional cash commitment authority required for all three services for 1950-51 would be about $50 million and an increase of 5-6 thousand would be required over the present personnel ceilings.

An increase in personnel for the Defence Research Board of approximately 125 engineers and scientists and 350 technicians, drivers and clerks would be required for the general acceleration of defence activities. This involved no extra cash for the present year.

(Statements showing the summary costs of the accelerated defence programme and summary costs of projections of the present authorities were circulated — Cabinet Document D250, dated July 18, 1950.)†

25. The Minister of Finance said that the item recommending additional magazine space might be re-examined. The Navy already had two large magazines and, if further space were necessary, there might be some sharing of facilities amongst the three Services.

26. The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that it would be wise to make an announcement as soon as possible indicating any increase in defence activity that might be approved. The Canadian Ambassador in Washington had received an advance text of a statement to be made by President Truman on the U.S. defence programme, announcing that he had authorized the Secretary of Defense to exceed the budgeted strength of the three Services; to use the selective service system to the extent required; and to call into active service such National Guard units and members of the Reserve Forces as necessary. Appropriations for the U.S. forces would be increased by about $10 billion and this would be followed by a request for further assistance to the North Atlantic allies and other countries. Legislative measures would later be proposed to authorize the establishment where necessary of priorities and allocations of materials; to limit the use of materials for non-essential purposes and to requisition supplies for defence, if necessary. He would recommend a sharp increase in Federal revenues through new taxation, in accordance with the programme to be submitted to Congress later. A number of other recommendations were made and it was likely that new legislation would do away with the "Buy America" Act.

27. The Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested that any announcement made by the Canadian Government should concentrate on the additional fighting equipment being provided rather than on increase in administrative or housekeeping facilities.

28. The Committee, after further discussion, approved the programme for the acceleration of the Canadian defence programme, as submitted by the Minister of National Defence, subject to further examination of the provision of twelve Sea Fury aircraft and new magazine space for the Navy.

KOREA; COMMUNICATION FROM THE SECRETARY-GENERAL OF THE UNITED NATIONS

1. The Prime Minister read a communication from the Secretary-General of the United Nations in which the need for additional effective assistance for the U.N. forces in Korea was pointed out and in which the Canadian Government was asked to examine Canadian capacity for such assistance, especially ground forces. This communication had been received twenty-four hours after Mr. Lie had announced its contents at a press conference. Strong representations had been made to the U.N. Secretariat that the Canadian Government were concerned that a press conference should have been held prematurely and that any action that implied criticism of a member of the United Nations should have been effected through the Security Council, rather than by the Secretary-General. Hope had been expressed that there would be no repetition of procedure of this nature.

Apparently the Secretary-General's action had been the result of political pressure from the U.S. State Department rather than military pressure from the Chiefs of Staff. It was suggested that a reply should be made in very general terms, leaving any details of further aid that Canada might make to be worked out between the appropriate authorities.

(Communication, Secretary-General of the United Nations to Acting Canadian Permanent Delegate, July 14, 1950)

In relation to the general question of Canadian participation, the recent goodwill visit of a U.S. aircraft carrier and seven destroyers to Quebec had probably led some Canadians to question the necessity of Canada drawing on her small naval resources to assist in Korea. Conversely, similar feeling might exist with respect to the projected cruise of the Magnificent and three destroyers in European waters this fall. It would be desirable if it could be brought home to the public that these cruises were for training and that the primary and most important role of these units was the defence of the North Atlantic area.

The Canadian Chiefs of Staff had not received, up to the present, any suggestion from military authorities in Washington that Canada should make a contribution of land forces.

2. Mr. St-Laurent said that the Cabinet Defence Committee had just heard the Chiefs of Staff and their advisers in connection with the international situation and the Korean war in particular. The possibility of further Canadian assistance and of acceleration of the defence programme had been discussed.

3. The Minister of National Defence outlined the military situation in Korea. The forces necessary to deal with the situation, together with American commitments in other parts of the world, including Germany and Japan, would take almost all available American strength. Neither the Commonwealth countries nor the European democracies would be able to supply any substantial forces for Korea. The consequences of the situation were very grave and would mean that, from roughly September for a period of about one year, almost all the trained and equipped forces of the Western countries would be committed and very little would be available to meet an emergency elsewhere or to strengthen Europe if the need arose. While the Russians might not have deliberately inspired the Korean conflict in an effort to promote a general war, they would undoubtedly realize the advantages of a situation where almost all effective democratic forces were involved outside any main theatre.

The Chiefs of Staff had advised that Canada was not in a position to contribute ground forces in Korea. Any participation of this nature would involve the brigade group which it was felt was essential for the defence of North America. With respect to a further naval contribution, there had been no indication that additional units would be helpful and it was considered that none could be made available in the light of our North Atlantic commitments.

There were two air contributions that might be offered. One, the provision of Mustang fighters, would not be effective as it had been ascertained that the United States already had in the area all the fighter aircraft that could be usefully employed. On the other hand, the provision of a transport squadron of North Star aircraft would appear to be valuable assistance. The United States had indicated, informally, that transport was in short supply and any Canadian contribution along these lines would be welcomed. Five North Stars could be made available within thirty-six hours; one more within two weeks; and four more within two or three months, making a total of ten, which could operate from the mainland to Honolulu or from the mainland to Tokyo.

The Korean situation had pointed up strikingly the weaknesses of the democracies, and it had been thought desirable to consider further steps which might be taken to strengthen Canadian defences generally. This would be making a contribution to the general problem of collective security and would involve largely an acceleration of the present programme, rather than additions to it. There were a number of actions that might be taken rather sooner than had been originally planned, which would strengthen our effective operational potential, and improve our readiness to meet an emergency. The Chiefs of Staff had made recommendations along these lines. Naval measures would include bringing destroyer crews up to operational establishments; commissioning of two minesweepers and two destroyers; fitting of tribal class destroyers with modern armament; and the provision of certain seaward defences. Steps recommended for the Army included bringing the brigade group up to strength and the provision of limited anti-aircraft defences. Air Force proposals included acceleration of the F-86 and CF-100 production programmes so as to provide three squadrons of the former and two of the latter by 1952, and the provision in the meantime of 100 Mustangs which could be purchased from the United States. These fighters had proved their value in Korea and in Exercise Sweetbriar and were exceptionally useful in an Army support role. They would bolster the Air Force until the F-86 and CF-100 were available in the required numbers.

Additional expenditure for the three services would be between $40 and $50 million and the over-all increase in personnel would be between 5 and 6 thousand men.

4. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that there had been considerable political pressure from the United States for participation in Korea of ground troops from other countries, mainly for the psychological effect. Undoubtedly, there would be other suggestions, such as a Commonwealth force or a U.N. international brigade, which might be composed of volunteers from U.N. countries under U.S. command, and equipped and trained by the latter. Contributing countries might be required to provide for the payment of nationals participating and to assume responsibility for reinforcement. While it was obviously not feasible, at present, for Canada to send a brigade group or regular ground forces in any number, it might be desirable to indicate at this time that if an international brigade were formed, the Canadian Government would consider recruitment of Canadian volunteers under the U.N. flag.

5. Mr. Pearson said that reports from Canadian missions abroad indicated that most countries were not unduly alarmed about the possibility of the conflict breaking into general war but that it was generally accepted that the U.S.S.R. would wish to keep it alive so as to neutralize as much Allied strength as possible. The Moscow press had charged the United States with using the United Nations as a shield for illegal intervention in Korea and contrasted this with the peace policy of the Soviet Union. There was some evidence of increased pressure by Russia in various points of the periphery, such as Yugoslavia, Iran, Berlin and especially Communist China. If Russia wished the war to spread, it would probably attempt to do so through China.

Nehru's attempt at mediation appeared ill-judged and ill-timed, but India occupied a most important position and it was essential to maintain friendly relations with her. In this respect, it was to be hoped that the United States would send a moderate reply to Nehru's proposal. Canadian views had been indicated informally to the Secretary of State in Washington.

The British agreed with the Indians that it was a matter of first importance in any settlement of the Korean dispute to get the Russians back in the Security Council.

President Truman was due to make an important statement after 12 o'clock that day and the Canadian Ambassador in Washington had been given the advance text. This indicated the intention of the United States to increase her strength for whatever eventualities might occur and to encourage other nations to do likewise. While it appeared that the United States had been badly informed concerning the strength of the North Korean forces and the weakness of the South Korean, and that military authorities had been taken aback by the President's decision to intervene actively, there was no doubt that the U.S. Government now was making a determined and united effort to bring the conflict to as rapid a conclusion as possible and to generally increase measures necessary for the security of their country and of their allies. The President would announce that he had authorized the Secretary of Defense to exceed the budgeted strength of the three services; to use the selective service system to the extent required; and to call into active service such National Guard units and members of the Reserve Forces as necessary. Appropriations for the U.S. forces would be increased by about $10 billion and this would be followed by a further request for assistance to the North Atlantic allies and other countries. Legislative measures would be proposed later to authorize the establishment where necessary of priorities and allocations of materials, to limit the use of materials for non-essential purposes and to requisition supplies for defence if necessary. He would recommend a sharp increase in Federal revenues through new taxation in accordance with the programme to be submitted to Congress later. A number of other recommendations were made and it was likely that new legislation would repeal the "Buy America" Act. In effect, the President's statement indicated partial mobilization in the United States.

(Telegram, Canadian Ambassador, Washington, to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, July 19, 1950 — WA-1560)†

6. Mr. Pearson suggested that if any statement were to be made on immediate Canadian action resulting from the international situation, it should emphasize that Korea was but one sector in a much larger struggle and that any steps taken to accelerate Canada's defence programme made a contribution to the solution of the general problem. It was also suggested that it might be desirable to indicate that the Government would give sympathetic consideration to a Canadian volunteer contingent participating in any international force under the United Nations, if such were formed. This sort of participation appeared to be preferable to a contribution to a Commonwealth force and it might be helpful if we indicated support of it now so as to avoid any pressure that would probably come later for involvement in a Commonwealth force.

7. Mr. St-Laurent said that if Canada were to contribute to an international force it would probably be necessary to call Parliament.

8. The Minister of Finance suggested that there were dangers to seating Communist China in the Security Council in return for the Russians using their influence on the North Koreans to withdraw to behind the 38th parallel. Public opinion might consider this an unwise form of appeasement.

9. Mr. Pearson said that there had been a large body of opinion before the Korean conflict that had considered that the time had come to admit Communist China to the United Nations. It might be suggested to the Russians that when the North Koreans had returned to the 38th parallel, sympathetic consideration would be given to reactivating the Security Council.

10. The Minister of Transport reported that conversations had been held with officials of Canadian Pacific Airlines, who at present were operating a weekly service to the Orient, on the possibilities of their participating in the air lift to supply and reinforce U.N. forces in Korea. They had indicated that, if their Australian service were abandoned, they could make available three Canadair Four's and trained crews for four aircraft of that type. These crews had had experience in the route which was to be flown and perhaps some form of combined operation could be worked out with the R.C.A.F.

11. Mr. St-Laurent submitted and read a draft statement for the press,[28] indicating in general terms the steps planned to accelerate the Canadian defence programme, announcing the projected participation in the airlift to supply and reinforce the U.N. forces in Korea and pointing out the considerations which had led to these decisions.

12. The Cabinet, after further discussion, approved:

(a) a contribution of a squadron of North Star aircraft for supplying and reinforcing the U.N. forces in Korea; consideration to be given to the possibility of Canadian Pacific Airlines participating in such an airlift;

(b) a general increase in defence expenditures, as submitted by the Minister of National Defence, involving an additional cash commitment for this fiscal year of between $40 and $50 million and an increase in personnel for the three armed services of 5 to 6 thousand;

(c) the draft statement submitted by the Prime Minister indicating in general terms the additional steps taken to assist the United Nations operations in Korea

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, July 20, 1950

Dear Hume [Wrong],

You will have received by now the statement on Korea which the Prime Minister gave to the press yesterday at the end of the afternoon session of the Cabinet meeting. That is as far as we intend to go here in participation in U.N. action in Korea at this time. Of course, one can make no predictions for the future; whether we should do more will depend on developments, but we certainly do not intend to be stampeded into action by feverish press editorials in this country or in the United States, or by suggestions from United States officials that we are "dragging our feet". Stanley Woodward and Julian Harrington have both, I suspect, been instructed by the State Department to make every effort to impress on us that we should send land forces to Korea, but they have not had much success. I do not need to tell you that we tend to react vigorously to pressure of this kind exerted by our neighbour. For instance, the other day the U.S. Ambassador made a special appointment to leave with Arnold [Heeney] a memorandum, a copy of which I am enclosing for your personal information. As you will see, the memorandum contained certain reports, designed, no doubt, to prod us to action, which, even if they had been accurate, would not have had that result. In fact, we had already learned that they were not authentic in so far as Pakistan is concerned, while the suggestion that we should follow Colonel [Juan] Peron's lead in fighting for justice and peace is pretty ridiculous.

I am afraid that American public opinion is becoming somewhat too excited and somewhat unreasonable over the inability of other nations at once to follow their boys into Korea. I would hope that some sensible sentiments might be uttered on this matter at Washington, but I suppose that this would be difficult in view of the state of public opinion there.

Another form of U.S. activity which worries us is pressure brought to bear on the United Nations Secretariat to take action which may not be wise in itself. The best example of this is the unhappy démarche of the Secretary-General last Friday — unfortunate both in the way it was made and what it was aimed to achieve. Our evidence, however, indicates that Trygve Lie was subjected to strong and, I think, unwise pressure by the Americans in New York, and that he was weak enough to yield to it.

There is a feeling in certain quarters in Canada that while United Nations intervention in Korea is genuine and to be supported, the Americans may try to exercise too strong a control over that intervention for their own purposes. I think Washington has been sincere and praiseworthy in its efforts to work through and with the United Nations, but you can find evidence to strengthen the suspicion indicated above. I think that they should be very careful in Washington not to play into the hands of those communists and their friends who claim that the U.N. is merely a cover for U.S. policy in regard to Korea. No doubt they appreciate this in the State Department, but Congress is another matter.

We have also been uneasy over certain revelations of weakness and instability in U.S. policy which recent Korean developments have disclosed. Messages from Europe indicate that the initial feeling of exhilaration there at U.S. and U.N. action is also being modified by similar anxieties. Certainly the complete ignorance of the U.S. authorities of what was transpiring in North Korea was shocking, but I think even more disturbing is the great gap that apparently existed between military and diplomatic policy in respect of Korea. It would appear that the military people had written Korea off as a place where military intervention would be required and, therefore, naturally, were not prepared for such intervention. On the other hand, the White House and the State Department reacted immediately and vigorously and rightly in favour of such intervention when the occasion required it. This must have been as great a surprise to the U.S. military as it was to the Kremlin. Surely the President and the Secretary of State should have let the military people know long ago that if and when an aggression was committed on the Korean Republic, the U.S. would take the lead in calling the U.N. into action. Sceptical persons, of course, say that this lead was taken in Korea, but would not be taken if a similar situation arose in Indo-China or Burma or Iran, etc. We may soon find out whether there is any basis for this scepticism, which, I should add, I do not share.

There is also a real anxiety, more particularly I think in the United Kingdom and certain European countries, that the linking together by the President, in his first statement, of Korea and Formosa might result in the extension of the conflict to Communist China. Certainly that first statement gave the Communist Chinese a golden opportunity to accuse the Americans of aggressive intentions against China, which they have exploited to the full. I realize that domestic considerations made a reference to Formosa necessary, but that merely underlines my point that U.S. domestic considerations may get the rest of us into trouble which otherwise could be avoided. I used to feel myself in Washington that the Administration always exaggerated their domestic and congressional difficulties as an explanation of whatever action or inaction they were engaged upon at the moment. I should, of course, add that the President's admirable statement yesterday regarding Formosa will do much to straighten the record in this particular.

Then there is the anxiety that the Korean campaign may engage too great a proportion of available U.S. strength which, in its turn, may create a feeling almost of despair in the free European countries. For this reason alone, I would have thought that the U.S. would have played down, rather than played up, the magnitude of the Korean conflict. Certainly, appeals to the world for help in this conflict is not playing it down. In this connection, I should think that the President's statement to Congress will be very helpful because it showed that the United States is not unaware of the danger, even the greater danger, facing other sectors of the democratic front, and is willing to take heroic measures to meet it.

What we can do up here is, of course, limited by public opinion, but I think that we can and should do considerably more than we have done. The first step in that direction was taken yesterday; no doubt it will have to be followed by others. It will, however, be more difficult, and not easier, to take those steps if the impression is given that the U.S. is bringing pressure on us, or suggestions are made that we are not pulling our weight. This is, of course, the first time that the U.S. have taken the first strain of an attack against a group of allied countries, and I wish that they could take it without so much fuss. However, that is the way they do things and they will, of course, once they get settled down, see the thing through at any cost and, I assume, at any point where the issue is joined.

So far, we have carried the Canadian people along. Even opinion in Quebec has been relatively calm and is becoming friendlier to stronger Canadian action. A false step would destroy that general support, and in the interests of the U.S. as well as ourselves, we should be careful not to take it.

I realize that most of the observations and comments I have been making in this letter are already familiar to you, and that you will have been making many of them yourself. It is so important, however, that we in Ottawa and you in the Embassy should completely understand one another at each point in the developing situation, that I have set down fully and freely my impressions as I look at matters here. I know that you will feel free to comment in like manner. I should like to say also that we are all very grateful for the full, frank and prompt reports which have been reaching us from you during these very difficult days.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

Memorandum by Ambassador of United States

STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], July 18, 1950

In strict confidence the State Department has been informed that Pakistan is seriously considering a contribution of a brigade of seasoned ground troops for Korea.

Also that New Zealand is seriously considering contribution of ground forces.

The Department is also informed that Colonel Peron is preparing troops in hope that Argentina will be the first Latin-American country to provide military aid in Korea.

Continuing reports indicate movement to north of Chinese Communist troops from South China and Indo-China border.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Repeat Washington EX-1150; London No. 1043.
Following from Heeney, Begins: My immediately following message contains the text of a communication which you are to deliver as soon as possible to the Secretary-General, in person. This is in reply to Mr. Lie's message of July 14 concerning assistance in Korea.

2. You will observe that the communication referred to in paragraph 1 follows largely the Prime Minister's statement of July 19, and that you are to attach to it a copy of that statement.

3. When you see the Secretary-General, you should take the opportunity of expressing the Canadian Government's interest in the idea of a United Nations Committee on the co-ordination of assistance for the defence of Korea. You might intimate that we are now inclined to the view that such a committee would perform a useful service, particularly in maintaining the United Nations character of the action being taken. For your own confidential information, we are more favourable now to such a committee because of the unfortunate manner in which the Secretariat have handled this whole business in many ways.

4. It may be that Mr. Lie will mention the reference made in our reply and in the Prime Minister's statement to participation in a United Nations force. If this question arises naturally in your conversation you should say that, if the Security Council takes steps to authorize the raising of such a force, the Canadian Government would be disposed to recommend to Parliament Canadian cooperation. For your own guidance, what our Minister has in mind is the possibility of a force (perhaps of divisional strength) which could be recruited in various countries, would be paid for by the United Nations and which would be trained and equipped by the United States. This, however, represents very tentative thinking and should not (repeat not) be put forward as a Canadian proposal.

5. We assume that the United Nations Secretariat will take steps to release our reply immediately after delivery. Please notify us at once so that simultaneous release can be made in Ottawa. Ends.

TELEGRAM 360 Ottawa, July 21, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Repeat Washington EX-1151; London No. 1044.
Following is the text referred to in Heeney's immediately preceding message of the reply to be delivered to the Secretary-General concerning Korea. Text Begins.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your message dated July 14th, 1950, concerning additional assistance to the forces operating in Korea under authority of the Security Council's Resolution of June 27th.

I am instructed to inform you that the Canadian Government has given full and earnest study to the request contained in your message in the light both of the needs of the Korean situation and of the other interests and responsibilities of Canada.

The Canadian Government understands that there is an immediate need for additional air transport. It has therefore decided to make available, at once, to the United Nations a long range air transport squadron including ground crews of the Royal Canadian Air Force, for assistance in the Pacific air lift. In accordance with your suggestion, the detailed arrangements for the participation of this squadron will be made with the unified command established under authority of the Security Council.

With respect to ground forces, for the reasons indicated in a statement issued by the Prime Minister on July 19th (of which I am enclosing a copy)† the Canadian Government is unable, at this stage, to despatch existing first line elements of the Canadian Army to the Korean theatre.

You will observe that in Mr. St. Laurent's statement reference is made to the Canadian Government's willingness to give consideration to participation in a United Nations force for service in Korea should a decision to that effect be taken by the Security Council.

With respect to naval assistance, you are aware three Canadian destroyers are already proceeding to Korean waters for service under the unified command.

Text of message ends.

As you will observe from the Prime Minister's statement, the Canadian Government, having in mind its defence responsibilities, including those as a member of the United Nations, is taking immediate steps for strengthening and increasing its armed forces. Ends.

Following for Heeney, Begins: Your teletype No. 359 of July 21st, message to Secretary-General concerning Korea.

1. As I reported by telephone, I delivered the communication contained in your teletype No. 360 to Mr. Lie at 4:45 Friday afternoon. Mr. Lie read the message eagerly and expressed relief and satisfaction in a manner which I am confident was much more than courtesy. He said that the R.C.A.F. squadron would be very helpful. What seemed to please him most was the reference to ground troops, because of the implication that the door was not closed. Along with this, he read with satisfaction the reference to the strengthening of the Canadian forces. His satisfaction on this account was not surprising in view of the increasing criticism of him for having taken what members of the Secretariat refer to as a "calculated risk" in sending the message. During a press conference just before I saw him, the Secretary-General had been under very heavy pressure to admit that the response to his plea had been a failure.

2. After the Secretary-General finished reading the communication and the Prime Minister's statement, he said it was the best reply he had received. He said that that morning he had had to publish nine replies which were not very good replies and he was very angry (he did not say at whom). The Canadian reply, however, was much better, and he would like to publish it immediately. However, he said that he could not publish the replies until publication had been cleared with the Unified Command. This clearing, however, was arranged expeditiously. Cordier gave Gross the gist of our message on the telephone, and pointed out that it was obviously a message which would be acceptable to the command and that there was, therefore, no need for direct negotiation between the Unified Command and the Canadian Government before the letter was published in final form. Gross agreed and the letter was immediately issued as a Security Council document.

3. Cordier, who was called in to read the message, was equally pleased by it. His particular source of satisfaction was the reference to a "United Nations force", an aspect of the message to which the Secretary-General had not previously referred. Cordier said that this Canadian reference to such a force would give them something to build on — the Secretariat could not make such a proposal. They thought that so important a matter should be authorized by the Security Council. He liked, therefore, the way in which the Canadian reference to the force was made. Mr. Lie expressed agreement, adding "you go and tell the Americans and the British, especially the British".

4. In accordance with your instructions I told Mr. Lie that the Canadian Government was interested in the idea of a United Nations Committee. He said that this had been his original idea and he still would like a Committee. I could not get him to say very specifically what he thought such a Committee could do, although he emphasized that it would not have any military responsibility. He referred, however, to the offers of assistance of various kinds which were coming in, and said that a Committee would be very helpful in coordinating this aid. I asked him if he thought that a Committee would be helpful to him and relieve him of some responsibility, and he said most emphatically that it would. Cordier, who still likes the idea of a Committee, pointed out nevertheless that there were some serious disadvantages. He was primarily worried about the problem of membership. He thought, however, that as the replies were coming in to Mr. Lie's message it might be easier to judge what countries should be represented on such a Committee. Ends.

CPAL OFFER OF PLANES FOR THE PACIFIC AIRLIFT

Mr. Baldwin, of the Air Transport Board, telephoned Mr. [C.S.A.] Ritchie on Friday, July 21, saying they were puzzled by the refusal of the offer of CPAL planes for the Pacific Airlift, and asked if we could find out why. In a telephone conversation with Mr. Ignatieff on July 24, I was told that the Canadian Service representatives in Washington were informed that the U.S. were not transporting personnel by air except a few senior officers but that their need was for freight transport. Mr. Ignatieff said the U.S. authorities were very appreciative of the offer of the RCAF Transport Squadron. I telephoned Mr. Baldwin to this effect.

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

TOP SECRET Ottawa, July 26, 1950

The United States Ambassador and Mr. Harrington came to see me this morning and left the attached memoranda.† One of these deals with recent increases in the military staff of the United States and the other with participation by all members of the United Nations in support of the United Nations effort in Korea.

2. In regard to the first, Mr. Woodward said that his Government hoped that the present meeting of the Deputies of the North Atlantic Council in London would result in an agreement to increase and strengthen the military effort of all the members of the Council. He hoped that the others would be able to take certain additional steps along the lines of those announced by President Truman.

3. Insofar as aid to Korea is concerned, his Government is most anxious that United Nations countries should offer ground forces. He felt that the symbolic significance of this would be very great, even if, as might be the case, some of the offers were not accepted by the unified command. e.g. Turkey, from which it would certainly be unwise to send troops.

4. I outlined to Mr. Woodward the Canadian position, but I told him that I would discuss the matter with you in the light of his visit and his memorandum. He said that they were particularly anxious that Canada should participate, as the nearest neighbour and the closest friend of the United States. I pointed out to him that there were certain considerations which had made the offer of ground forces undesirable at the present time and which still applied to our permanent army. However, we appreciated the importance of making this a United Nations effort, and we accepted the implications of that stand. I mentioned to him in passing that when we approached the State Department on occasions for co-operative assistance in military matters, we were often told that they could not discriminate in favour of Canada against Latin American countries. I hoped that this non-discrimination would apply to obligations as well as contributions. He appreciated the point and said that they were very anxious to have Latin American participation in land forces. I then mentioned that a distinction should, I think, be drawn between the political and military significance of small military contributions. The former might be important, while the latter might have little effect. The addition of military driblets to Korean forces might be a nuisance. I added that it was very unwise of people in Washington to relate mathematically U.S. and Canadian defence efforts and contributions. They had the main authority and responsibility and had to pay the price of it. Mr. Woodward did not demur at this.

5. I thought that this was a good opportunity to bring up another matter which has been interesting me. So I mentioned to Mr. Woodward the great importance of giving some United Nations consideration at once to the ultimate political settlement in Korea. It seemed clear that it would not be possible or desirable to return to the status quo, but it was equally undesirable that Asian peoples should think the ultimate settlement might be an American one. Therefore, would there not be something in favour of setting up at once a United Nations Commission to examine a new political settlement for Korea. This, I think, would have a very beneficial effect in Asia. The Commission might consist of five members, three of whom could be Asian leaders such as Nehru, Liaquat Ali Khan or Thakin Nu.[29] Even if these statesmen might not themselves serve, they could appoint deputies. Woodward was interested in this idea, and no doubt will pass it on to Washington. Indeed, I hope they have already been considering something like it in the State Department.

U Thakin Nu, Prime Minister of Burma.

FUNERAL OF MR. MACKENZIE KING

The Prime Minister expressed appreciation of the organization by the Minister of National Defence, and the officials who had worked under him, of the state funeral for Mr. King.

KOREA; GENERAL SITUATION; REQUEST FOR CONTRIBUTION OF CANADIAN FORCES

2. The Secretary of State for External Affairs outlined the military situation in Korea. There appeared to be about a 50-50 chance of holding the South Korean bridgehead. A communication had been received from the United States Ambassador requesting the contribution of a Canadian ground force. He outlined the assistance that had been promised by certain other United Nations countries. His own opinion was that the government should recommend to Parliament that a brigade group be specially recruited as volunteers for a United Nations force to fight in Korea. Canada had every interest in strengthening the U.S. position as leader in the struggle against Communism. The lesson of effective United Nations co-operation would not be lost on the U.S.S.R.

3. The Minister of National Defence said the decision of the British government to make a brigade group available had apparently been made notwithstanding the advice of the Chiefs of Staff concerning the lack of available United Kingdom strength. The political considerations which led the United Kingdom to that decision applied with even greater force to Canada. He suggested possible ways in which a ground force could be raised for use in Korea.

4. The Minister of Trade and Commerce thought pressure to send troops would be irresistible once the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand had agreed to send ground forces.

5. The Minister of Fisheries agreed. He did not see how Canada could honourably fail to come to the aid of the United States.

6. The Leader of the Government in the Senate thought that, irrespective of any aid to United Nations forces in Korea, Canadian preparedness should be increased. Parliament ought to be summoned at an early date.

7. The Cabinet, after further discussion, agreed that decision be deferred on the dispatch of a Canadian ground force to assist the United Nations forces in Korea; the Secretary of State for External Affairs pending further consideration, to continue discussion of the matter with the Secretary of State of the United States.

Note du chef de la Direction des Nations Unies pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures[30]

Memorandum from Head, United Nations Division, to Secretary of State for External Affairs[30]

PROPOSALS FOR A UNITED NATIONS GROUND FORCE

As I understand it, the proposal for a United Nations ground force originated in the Secretary-General's office as a result of a flood of offers of voluntary service which has been received by the Secretariat during the past few weeks. The Secretary-General and Cordier were perplexed as to what to do with these offers of service. As matters stood, the only response that could be made was to advise the volunteers to join the United States forces, or alternatively to hope that circumstances would arise which would make it possible for them to serve the United Nations in the forces of their own country.

2. As a result of this situation the Secretariat turned their minds to the possibility of a United Nations force. I think they originally had in mind a kind of Foreign Legion, made up of individual volunteers from various member states. They were anxious, however, to avoid having merely a company of adventurers and soldiers of fortune, and therefore were anxious from the beginning to secure the assistance of member states in the process of recruitment.

3. The idea that organized contingents should be contributed to a United Nations Division was an idea which subsequently emerged in the discussions. The proposal received little encouragement in either form (United Nations Foreign Legion or United Nations Division of organized national units) and lay dormant until the reference to it in the Prime Minister's statement brought it to light. The Secretariat then tried to carry the matter further by suggesting that General MacArthur be asked to name a non-American General to organize, train and possibly to command the non-American ground forces which took part in the campaign. Cordier said that he thought sufficient authority now lay with the United Nations commander to name such an officer without further action by the Security Council, although he agreed that further action might be both necessary and desirable.

4. Throughout these informal discussions, the Secretariat was obviously apprehensive lest it be got into the position of making proposals that were unacceptable to member states. The proposal therefore lacked any real sponsorship. This accounts for the fact that there has recently been the tendency to suggest that it is a Canadian idea.

5. There are, of course, certain inconsistencies which are made apparent by the proposal. A United Nations ground force, specifically so called, would underline the fact that the United States forces now operating in Korea are technically not United Nations forces, nor did they operate under a United Nations command. General MacArthur would therefore become a dual personality — a United States General commanding United States troops in an American war, and a United Nations commander commanding United Nations troops in a United Nations war. This, of course, strictly speaking, is the position as it now exists, but the anomaly created by the constitutional inability of the United States to place its troops under a United Nations commander is blurred and concealed by the present position.

6. A further anomaly would arise if some states which contributed ground forces preferred to attach them directly to the United States forces rather than indirectly through a U.N. Division. It would be necessary, therefore, to make sure that the U.N. Division did not become merely a remnant of troops which for one reason or another were not made directly part of the United States forces.

7. I attach a list of the questions which it occurs to me that you might wish to take up while you are away.[31]

CANADIAN GROUND FORCES FOR KOREA

You might find useful the following draft of a statement which might be made by the Prime Minister on the provision of Canadian ground forces for Korea:

The Secretary-General of the United Nations on _____ issued the following statement:

In response to appeals to member states for assistance in repelling the armed attack against the Republic of Korea, contingents of ground forces have now been made available by a number of member states for service under the United Nations unified command provided for in the Security Council resolution of July 7; and recruiting for this purpose is now in progress. The detailed procedures for working out the necessary arrangements for this purpose are already the subject of discussion between the member states concerned and the United States Government, for consideration by the unified command.

In view of this statement and of the situation which has developed since I made my statement of July 19 on Canadian assistance to United Nations forces in Korea, the Canadian Government will recommend to Parliament that a United Nations contingent of the Canadian Army consisting of a Brigade group be raised for service with the international force of the United Nations operating in Korea under the United Nations Commander. Parliament is being summoned to meet on August _____ and this recommendation will be submitted to Parliament for approval.

KOREA

Reference my immediately preceding teletype,† the following is the text of a statement made by Sunde as President of the Security Council immediately before the adjournment of this afternoon's Security Council meeting, Begins: The Council may wish to take note of the response to the request for participation by members of the United Nations in police operations against the aggressor in Korea. Land, naval and air contingents have been or are being made available to assist South Korean and United States forces which are at present bearing so courageously the burden of combat. These contingents will constitute with those already in action the United Nations force — to operate together under a unified command. This is a development of great practical and even greater historical significance. The Council in taking note of it will, I feel sure, wish to add an expression of its hope that other contributions, particularly of land troops, can be added as soon as possible to the United Nations forces which are now being assembled.[32]

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL New York, August 1, 1950

Dear Mr. Pearson,

There were a few incidents consequent upon your lunch yesterday with the Secretary-General in which you might be interested.

While I was in the Delegates' Lounge just before the Security Council meeting began, Mr. Lie came in and headed straight for Mr. Sunde. I was considerably encouraged to notice that Mr. Lie was waving a familiar piece of paper and obviously seeking to convince Mr. Sunde in Norwegian of the desirability of something. As you are aware from our telegram no. 544 of 31 July, Mr. Sunde at the conclusion of the Security Council meeting made a statement which was almost exactly that which you had drafted. It may be, of course that the slight changes in the introduction were agreed upon between you and Mr. Lie.

After the meeting Mr. Lie sought me out in the Delegates' Lounge to tell me that the President had made the statement, and asked me to be sure to let you know. I said that I would certainly do so immediately and that I was sure you would be very much gratified. Mr. Lie, who has been criticized so frequently of late, seemed almost childishly happy about pleasing you. I was somewhat disturbed, however, when in an excess of enthusiasm he said that he would see that this statement got good publicity. At this point he called Tom Hamilton who happened to be walking past. He told me that he had already told Hamilton to play up the statement. He thereupon departed, waving the piece of paper at both of us, and protesting loudly that this was not his work, it was mine. He concluded: "You see, I'm not the one this time that asks for ground forces." Hamilton turned to me, somewhat bewildered, to find out what this was all about. He said that Mr. Lie had told him previously that the Canadians and the South Americans wanted this reference to an international force. He said that he was in the process of writing a story on the subject and would like to know more. It seemed to me that it would be very unfortunate if Hamilton indicated that we had been directly responsible for Sunde's statement, and I endeavoured to divert him therefore by references to the mention of an international force in Mr. St. Laurent's statement.

You may be interested in the attached article entitled "Swedish Delegate Urges U.N. Force" which appeared in this morning's New York Times.† This is the article which Hamilton wrote. The reference to Canada's interest is, I think, quite innocuous.

Yours sincerely,
JOHN W. HOLMES

KOREAN SITUATION

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussions at the meeting of July 19, 1950, reported that he and the Secretary to the Cabinet had had discussions recently on Korea and related matters with the United States Secretary of State, senior U.S. and U.K. officials in Washington, and with the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

Mr. Acheson had emphasized that the Korean situation could only be dealt with and intelligently understood as a phase (and not in the long run the most important phase) of the general conflict between the free and Communist worlds. Strategically, Korea was not important and the decision to resist aggression there had been primarily determined by political considerations. The incident, however, had underlined a very dangerous international situation. Great importance was attached to the United Nations' character of the action as, if United States forces were committed alone, there was danger that American public opinion would favour preparing in isolation for the possible larger conflict ahead. If all free democracies would co-operate towards putting themselves in a position to save freedom from the menace of international Communism it would be infinitely easier for each of them to achieve a common objective to preserve peace.

As far as Korea was concerned, Mr. Acheson was emphatic that even single battalions would be not only of political value but effective help. He did not feel that the danger of directing too much strength to Korea was a real one. Six or seven divisions would be all that would be required. These would not in any event save the free world if a general conflict began but they could be very valuable in Korea, would make general war less likely and co-ordinated international effort for further re-armament far more acceptable to public opinion than if the United States withdrew from Korea, were defeated there, or won there alone.

Mr. Acheson then outlined the very extensive measures the U.S. Government would take to increase its own preparedness and that of its allies. The United States were most anxious to have this positive evidence of their own determination matched with equal determination in friendly countries. In the case of a general war, American forces in Korea would have to be withdrawn as soon as possible. The free countries would have to do what they could to defend themselves while American air power was brought to bear on Russian cities and industries. If there were aggression elsewhere similar to that committed in Korea through Communist satellites, he thought the United Nations should meet the challenge in the same way it had in Korea, although the United States would probably not be able to take the initial responsibility in repelling aggression that it had been able to take in Korea.

2. Mr. Pearson also reported on the discussions with senior U.K. and U.S. officials. These had been principally on the way in which the United Nations contributions of ground forces could be integrated into the operations in Korea under the United Nations Command. There would appear to be four possible types of offers of forces from countries other than from the United States:

(1) trained and equipped formations. The Americans believed that a trained formation such as a brigade, a regimental combat team or even a battalion would be the most useful and effective contribution under present conditions. Presumably, a formation of this kind would be offered to the United Nations and the Unified Command would use it as it saw fit.

(2) formations of volunteers to be recruited, equipped and trained in their own countries. This was a variant of (1), but, instead of trained and equipped formations, there would be volunteers who would have to be trained and equipped. Discussion suggested that it would be desirable for volunteer formations of this kind to be trained together as, say, an international division. They might require U.S. equipment and training or, if the majority of the forces so raised were using British equipment this might be used for the whole division. It was possible that, in this way, there might be a United Nations division of U.K., Australian, New Zealand, Pakistan, Turkish and Canadian troops.

(3) volunteers to be recruited and trained as a national contingent in a United Nations division. The obligation of each nation would be to enlist volunteers and accept financial responsibility for maintenance and equipment. Personnel would, however, be trained from the beginning in a United Nations mixed division or brigade though kept together as a national group within that formation.

(4) individual volunteers for a United Nations formation organized along the lines of the French Foreign Legion. This was an extension of the international force idea of (3). In this case individuals would be recruited not as nationals but as soldiers for a United Nations legion. The United Nations would, presumably, be responsible for financing, equipping, maintenance, and so on.

3. The Minister of National Defence reported on action that had been taken in accordance with the previous Cabinet decision to accelerate the defence programme and to provide assistance for the United Nations forces in Korea.

Inquiries had been received from the United Kingdom about Canadian participation in a Commonwealth division for Korea. There were a number of courses of action that might be followed; part of the existing brigade group could be made available to the United Nations for service in Korea; a formation could be recruited especially for this purpose; or a special service force organized which would not be specifically tied down to Korea but designed to serve the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty or of the United Nations.

There would appear to be more likelihood of obtaining 4,000 or 5,000 men for either of the latter two alternatives if it was indicated that recruiting was definitely for service in Korea or elsewhere. It would take about six months to raise and train forces of this nature and the cost of maintenance in Canada for this period and for a further six months overseas would be approximately $25 million. A separate supply line would be impractical and undesirable and the forces could be tied in with either the U.S. or Commonwealth units, preferably the latter. The other types of United Nations forces suggested presented serious military difficulties.

If it were decided to raise a brigade group this could be done without calling Parliament as long as the unit remained in Canada. Money now allotted for pay and food could be diverted to cover the costs provided that Supplementary Estimates were voted when Parliament re-convened. If any action was to be taken it was of the greatest importance that this be done with the minimum of delay as it would be necessary, for instance, to put a number of buildings in habitable condition before the onset of winter.

4. The Prime Minister said that it should be made clear that any force to be raised in Canada would be used for any action Canada might be required to take under its obligations to the United Nations or the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. In accordance with the commitments made at the end of the last Session, it would, of course, be necessary to summon Parliament at a later date. It should be noted, however, that Parliamentary approval was not required to place Canadian forces on active service. The Defence Act (Section 33), merely provided that whenever Canadian forces were placed on active service Parliament should be called within ten days in order that it could be informed of the step taken.

5. Mr. St-Laurent submitted for approval a draft statement[33] that he proposed to make over the National Network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with respect to Korean developments and the steps proposed to be taken by the Government in this connection. The statement would review international developments during the past few weeks and would state, amongst other things:

(a) that no part of the Canadian Airborne Brigade group could be despatched immediately to Korea without dangerously weakening the defences of this country;

(b) that Canada was and, since the inception of the United Nations, has been ready and willing to contribute to an International Force under the aegis of the United Nations; such a Force, however, had never been organized, largely because of wilful obstruction on the part of the Soviet Union;

(c) that in view of recent deteriorations in the international situation, and of the police action taken by the United Nations in Korea, the Government would step up its defence operations, and would begin immediately recruiting a Special Force of the Canadian Army, to include infantry, artillery and other elements; this Special Force would be trained and equipped to be available for use in carrying out Canada's obligations under the United Nations Charter or the North Atlantic Pact, in Korea or elsewhere;

(d) that a Special Session of Parliament would be called, probably in six or seven weeks' time.

6. The Minister of Finance pointed out that Canada, as well as other western countries, would probably have to go on a semi-war economy during the next few years. At the coming Session of Parliament it should be made clear that the considerable increase in the defence budget would necessitate restraining certain purely peace-time productive activities. It was also probable that accelerated defence measures would cause a renewed inflationary spiral which might have to be curbed by the imposition of controls. It was not felt, however, that wage and price controls generally would be necessary in the near future. Some steps might have to be taken in the fields of commodity taxes and consumer credit.

Generally speaking, it would seem unwise to announce immediately any estimate of detailed cash requirements. It would probably be wiser to over-estimate than under-estimate the costs involved in order to facilitate establishment of the fiscal measures required consequent on the defence programme and possibly resultant inflation.

It was estimated that the surplus for the current fiscal year might reach $100 million, as compared with the $20 million surplus forecast at the time of the last budget. It was, therefore, possible that this surplus might be sufficient to absorb increases in the defence budget this year.

7. The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not believe that the increased defence measures would have any strong impact on the economy for some six months or more. The only serious increase in prices which were likely to occur during the next few months would be in food and certain imported commodities.

8. The Minister of National Defence submitted proposed increased and accelerated programmes for the armed services.

The Naval programme included the successive commission of 1 cruiser, 3 destroyers, 1 frigate and 2 minesweepers presently in reserve; increase in training facilities; the preparation of seaward defences; acceleration of shipbuilding projects by authorizing the construction of 4 additional A.S. vessels, 10 minesweepers and 4 gate vessels (increasing the total shipbuilding programme from 8 to 26 vessels); the purchase of 12 Sea Furies from the United Kingdom for the aircraft carrier Magnificent; the rearmament of destroyers with 3"50 guns; and an increase in stocks of ammunition. Present allotment for the Naval Forces totalled $82 million. The augmented Naval programme would entail additional cash requirements of approximately $27 million for 1950-51, $58 million for 1951-52 and $46 million for 1952-53. It was proposed that the authorized Naval establishment be increased from 9,600 to 16,105.

The increased Army programme would include bringing the Brigade Group to strength; the provision of 2 additional AA batteries; the accelerated procurement of anti-tank weapons and rocket launchers; the provision of additional accommodation; an increase in training facilities; and the recruiting, training and equipment of a Special Field Force of 4,485 officers and men, comprising a brigade headquarters, 3 infantry battalions, 1 field artillery regiment, 1 field ambulance, 1 infantry workshop, 1 transport company, and other necessary services. Reinforcements would also have to be provided for the Special Field Force. First line reinforcements would total approximately 900. The present Army allotment totalled $130 million. The accelerated programme would entail additional cash requirements of approximately $15 million in 1950-51, $32 million in 1951-52 and $28 million in 1952-53. It was proposed that the authorized Army establishment be increased from 22,000 to 30,000.

The proposed R.C.A.F. programme would include, amongst other things, the provision of a total of 28 squadrons by the end of 1953. These squadrons would be made up of fighter, transport and photo-reconnaissance units. Aircraft required would include F86 and CF100 fighters, Lancasters, North Stars, C-119 transports and Mustangs. It was also proposed to increase aircrew training facilities for N.A.T.O. countries to bring the total aircrew training to 1,260 per annum, and to accelerate the provision of radar facilities with headquarters at Montreal, Vancouver, Toronto, and Halifax. The present R.C.A.F. allotment totalled $169 million. The increased programme would involve additional cash requirements of approximately $48 million in 1950-51, $122 million in 1951-52 and $127 million in 1952-53. It was proposed to increase authorized R.C.A.F. establishments from 17,800 to 26,146.

The total programme for all services would involve an estimated additional expenditure of approximately $90 million for the current fiscal year. Total authorized establishment for the three armed services would be increased from 49,400 to 79,341.

(National Defence Summary, Sheets 1 and 2, Aug. 5, 1950)†

9. Mr. Claxton pointed out that the Special Field Force of approximately 5,000 men would not form part of the regular Army. It was the intention to recruit these men for a predetermined period of time and for service abroad if required under United Nations and North Atlantic Pact commitments. Recruits to this Force would not contribute to nor enjoy benefits of the Active Force Pension Fund.

In order to fulfil the accelerated programme, it would be necessary to recruit between 5,000 and 10,000 men during the next two months. At the present time recruiting was at the rate of 1,000 or less per month. To facilitate recruiting as much as possible, it was suggested that the Veterans' Charter be made applicable to members of the Special Force. If this were done, veterans would be entitled to the same benefits upon being demobilized from the Special Field Force as were veterans of World War II.

In connection with the Special Field Force, it was proposed to take married or single men between the ages of 19 and 35, with the age limit increased to 45 years for tradesmen. Recruits should be Canadian citizens or British subjects having passed reasonable Pulhems tests. Preference would be given to veterans who, where possible, would be given the same rank as that held on honourable discharge following World War II. The period of enrolment would be for 18 months but, if a longer period were required because of action taken by Canada pursuant to an international agreement, there would be a liability to serve until no longer needed in consequence of such action or until the expiration of one year after the expiration of an emergency. This last provision would require an amendment to the Defence Act. Pay scales would be those of the Active Force and consideration would be given to provision of dependents allowances.

10. Mr. Claxton further pointed out that, to implement the proposed programme and begin recruiting immediately, it would be necessary to bring additional sections of the Defence Act into force. It would also be necessary to pass an Order in Council authorizing an increase in the permanent establishments of the three Services.

11. Mr. St-Laurent said, in connection with the proposed Naval programme, that it had been suggested that anti-submarine work was gradually becoming the most important aspect of Naval operations. It was further to be noted that the trend seemed to be towards the construction of larger aircraft carriers capable of handling jet-propelled craft. Although Canada's major role in the last war and subsequently had been one of anti-submarine work, it might well be that eventually this phase of Naval operations would be beyond the financial capacities of this country. If this proved to be correct, consideration should be given to a reallocation of military responsibility amongst the various N.A.T.O. countries. In any event, this possibility should be kept in mind and some indication of the problems involved should be given during discussions with representatives of other countries concerned.

It would also seem advisable to make a greater effort to achieve really effective mutual aid in the matter of procurement of armaments. As an example, the accelerated programme envisaged, amongst other things, the procurement of 12 Sea Furies from the United Kingdom. On the other hand, it had been noted that there was a surplus of some 400 A/A guns in good condition in Canada. If all or a portion of this A/A equipment could be used in the United Kingdom, it might be possible to arrange some sort of barter agreement. The advantages in this type of arrangement seemed obvious and would avoid, amongst other things, certain exchange difficulties that arose when purchases had to be made outright.

12. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion:

(a) approved the statement proposed to be made by the Prime Minister on the evening of August 7th, over the National Network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, subject to certain minor revisions;[34]

(b) approved in principle the proposal submitted by the Minister of National Defence for increased and accelerated programmes for the armed services, subject to certain reservations as to the proper balance to be achieved by the three services (with particular reference to a possible curtailment in future Naval expansion);

(c) approved the proposal of the Minister of National Defence for the recruiting of a Canadian Army Special Force under conditions as recommended, for use in discharging Canadian obligations under United Nations or North Atlantic Treaty commitments; an Order in Council to be passed accordingly;

(d) agreed that a proclamation [be] issue[d] bringing into force Sections 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 47 and 48 of the Defence Act effective August 7th, 1950;

(Order in Council P.C. 3858, Aug. 7, 1950)†

(e) agreed that an Order in Council be passed authorizing increases in permanent establishments of the armed forces to 13,440 for the Navy, 30,800 for the Army and 24,920 for the R.C.A.F.;

(Order in Council P.C. 3859, Aug. 7, 1950)†

(f) agreed that an Order in Council be passed authorizing the Minister of National Defence to fix, with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance, the maximum number of persons in each rank and trade group of the Canadian forces;

(Order in Council P.C. 3897, Aug. 9, 1950)†

(g) noted the report of the Minister of Finance on the possible economic impact of the proposed accelerated defence programme.

LAND FORCES FOR KOREA

I have been trying to clear my own mind on this problem, in the light of our discussions yesterday. My view then was that we should call Parliament for September, to consider three main questions. I still feel that way.

The three main questions are:

(1) The strengthening of our defences and the economic and financial steps that may have to be taken as a consequence of our own and American rearmament. What is happening across the border cannot fail to have strong impact here. I think we should at once begin to examine these matters so that a concrete programme to deal with them can be laid before Parliament. If this programme does not require any legislative action at this time, should we not put Parliament in possession of the facts as we see them, and the plans and intentions of the government for dealing with them.

(2) We should report, I think, to Parliament on North Atlantic developments; especially the plans to increase speedily and greatly the strength of the alliance. We will certainly be asked to join the United States in assisting the European members — by supplies and equipment — to bring about that increase. This will involve extra expenditures by us. Equipment for a Netherlands division from our reserve stocks is one way we could help. So far, we have not, I think, considered this project — or any other like it — in Defence Committee or in Cabinet.

(3) Then there is the question of further assistance to United Nations forces in Korea. Even if the decision were to do nothing more, I think the reasons for that decision should be explained to Parliament.

I feel strongly, however, that this would be the wrong decision, and personally I would have great difficulty in reconciling it with my views on the menace which faces us, on the expression of that menace in Korea, and the necessity of defeating it there by United Nations action.

At the same time, I appreciate the difficulties and, indeed, the objections to an offer of land forces to the United Nations for Korea which could not be justified by the actual situation; strategic and political; domestic and international.

The attached memorandum shows how land forces from Canada could be made available if a decision to that end were taken in principle.

I feel that alternative three is the best method. If something along these lines is agreed on, I would suggest that it be announced in terms which would make clear that our new brigade is solely for the defence of Canada and of peace; that Korea is merely one sector of the struggle against Communist aggression and that Parliament, in special session, would be expected to consider, not merely Korea, but the whole defence picture and the struggle for peace.

A draft announcement is attached.

Memorandum

TOP SECRET Ottawa, August 1, 1950

LAND FORCES FOR KOREA

There are various ways in which, singly or in combination, Canadian land forces could be made available for service to the United Nations in Korea. They include the following:

1. A Canadian Battalion such as the Princess Pats could be put under the unified command immediately. Presumably it would then serve in Korea as a unit in a larger, possibly a United States formation.

2. A regimental combat team could be collected from the permanent force and be made available to the unified command.

3. A mixed Brigade of volunteers could be recruited here, trained here as part of Canada's new defence programme, and then be associated with other forces made available to the United Nations by countries other than the United States. These forces might constitute an international Division for service in Korea under the unified command.

If most of the contingents made available for such a Division were from the Commonwealth, then British type equipment could be used; otherwise, American. This Brigade would, in effect, be the kind of help we would presumably have organized if we had been able to make a military agreement with the Security Council under Article 43. This would be emphasized in any announcement to be made and in the recruiting that would begin. In effect it would mean that the Canadian army would include a Brigade especially trained for Arctic operations, as an airborne formation and one specially trained for U.N. operations, as a contingent with other U.N. formations.

This idea has, I think, very much in its favour. It underlines the fact that from now on we fight only as a result of U.N. decisions, and with other U.N. members as a Police Force to make such decisions effective and to restore peace. If Canada emphasized this principle in announcing its decision, we might be initiating something new in the way of backing up the United Nations which could have important consequences. At the same time we would be basing one part of our small army on the Charter of the U.N.

4. Canada could recruit volunteers for a special United Nations Force or Legion. These recruits could either be given initial training in Canada and sent forward to a U.N. base as a formation, or they could be recruited merely as individuals who would be forwarded at once to the United Nations base. In either case they would serve as a Canadian component of the United Nations Legion, be grouped and identified as such, and we would be responsible for their finance and maintenance.

5. Canada could recruit or permit the United Nations to recruit volunteers for a United Nations Legion which would be equipped and financed by the United Nations itself. In this case we would bear only our share of the cost as a member of the world organization irrespective of the number of Canadians in the Legion. We might also be asked to supply Instructors for this Legion, and to allow it to be trained in Canada. There are many practical difficulties about (4) and (5), such as jurisdiction, financing, pensions, allowances for dependents, etc. There are also, however, some important political advantages in setting up a special non-national force to fulfil U.N. responsibilities.

Projet d'annonce

Draft Announcement

TOP SECRET Ottawa, August 3, 1950

The Government has decided that Parliament should be summoned to meet in special session to consider the international situation in the light of the recent Communist aggression in Korea. It is expected that this session will be called early in the autumn, though if developments in the international situation make an earlier meeting necessary, Parliament will at once be summoned.

This special session will have before it government plans for putting Canada in a stronger position to meet, in company with the other free nations and through the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the threat to peace which faces the free world. This threat has been made greater and clearer by what has happened in Korea, and will require a far greater effort on the part of this country than has ever been necessary before in time of peace.

Parliament will be asked to approve an increase in Canada's active forces. Recruitment for an additional Army Brigade will begin immediately. All additions to the Canadian armed forces in being will assist in the direct defence of the North American continent. This Brigade, however, will be specially trained and equipped so that it will be available for use in carrying out Canada's obligations under the United Nations Charter or the North Atlantic Pact. Naturally, such a Brigade would be available to the United Nations for service in Korea as part of United Nations forces, if it could be most effectively used in that way. Details regarding its possible use in a United Nations force are being discussed with the Unified Command established as a result of the action taken by the Security Council of the United Nations to resist aggression in Korea. Though action is being taken to form this Brigade immediately, it will not be moved outside Canada for combat purposes until Parliament, at the session which will be summoned, has approved.

The Government has also been discussing with other Governments and the United Nations Secretariat, the possibility of the establishment of a specially recruited United Nations formation for service in Korea or elsewhere under the authority of the United Nations. This formation would consist of individuals recruited from the various member states for the above purpose. A proposal of this kind, however, will take time to implement, as it is unprecedented. If the United Nations should decide to take this action, the Canadian Government will assist in recruiting Canadian nationals for this purpose.

IMMEDIATE

1. Please deliver the message given below as soon as possible to the Secretary-General. We assume that the United Nations' Secretariat will take steps to release this message immediately after delivery. Please notify us at once so that simultaneous release can be made in Ottawa.

2. For your own information the United States defence authorities were asked, through Canadian service channels, about July 25, whether they would welcome a Canadian offer to provide the additional airlift assistance mentioned below. They replied in the affirmative August 4th. Since that time the necessary arrangements have been made with C.P.A.L. and it is understood that the United States forces will begin using the company's planes immediately.

3. Following is the text of the message. Begins:

"I have the honour to refer to my message No. 29 of July 21, 1950[36] concerning additional Canadian assistance to the forces operating in Korea under the authority of the Security Council's Resolution of June 27. In that message I informed you that the Canadian Government had decided to make available to the United Nations a long-range air transport squadron, including ground crews, of the Royal Canadian Air Force, for assistance in the Pacific airlift.

I am instructed to inform you that the Canadian Government has now decided, with the co-operation of Canadian Pacific Airlines, to make available, at once, to the United Nations, the complete passenger facilities of the regular Canadian commercial air service between Vancouver and Tokyo, operated by Canadian Pacific

SECRET Ottawa, August 14, 1950

Mr. Woodward, the United States Ambassador, called to see me this morning about the matter which he discussed with you at St. Patrick yesterday. He began by telling me how very deeply he appreciated your kindness in receiving him and how sorry he was to have had to bother you. Apparently his instructions were pretty rigid on the subject. I told him that I assumed that these instructions were not aimed at Canada alone, but that all United States representatives in countries which had accepted the United Nations Security Council resolution on Korea were asked to make similar approaches. He indicated that my assumption in this matter was correct, and that there was no intention to single out Canada.

Mr. Woodward then gave me a short outline of his conversation with you, and left with me a copy of the aide mémoire,† which I believe he gave you.

I told him that we were just as preoccupied as he was with the efforts of the U.S.S.R. to make the conflict in Korea appear one between the United States and the Korean people, and to play down its United Nations character. For that reason, I realized, of course, that it would be desirable to have other than United States ground forces participating in the campaign as soon as possible. I explained to him however, that small countries like Canada do not have expeditionary forces in being for purposes of this kind and that to send our permanent force, or a part of it, to Korea for immediate action would, in our opinion, be unwise. I went into the point in some detail, repeating arguments with which you are already familiar. I said, however, I was sure there was no disposition to delay the training of our special United Nations brigade and that I felt sure that everything would be done that could possibly be done to make it available as soon as possible for United Nations action. Meanwhile, should the United States not play up to the greatest possible extent action in Korea other than American, e.g., the operations of the South Korean army? He agreed with this. I then mentioned that the three Canadian destroyers might soon be in action. I understood they had been doing convoy work, which was not very spectacular, but that they would shortly be bombarding coastal communications, etc. This would be an opportunity for the United States public relations people to emphasize Canadian cooperation in the active side of the war.

Mr. Woodward agreed with this and once again said they really did appreciate in Washington what we had done.

I then went on to tell him that there were other ways than military of emphasizing the United Nations character of the Korean operation. Mr. Woodward himself had mentioned the use which Malik was making of the Security Council, and I suggested that our tactics there had not been very successful. In this connection, I told him that I had sent a personal and secret message to Jack Hickerson on Thursday and had received a reply the next day,† which showed that they were not only worried about what had been going on in the Security Council, but were taking steps to correct the situation. But it was not only at the Security Council that the Russians had had successes in propaganda. General MacArthur had done a good deal to help them, I thought, in his visit to Formosa. One of the great dangers of the present situation was the linking of United Nations policy in Korea and United States policy re Communist China. The Russians were doing their very best to establish such a link, and they had been given a good deal of unnecessary help, I thought, in this regard. Woodward said that both the President and Mr. Acheson were as worried about this matter as I was.

In my talk with Woodward I was anxious to let him know that the United Nations character of the Korean question could be helped, not merely by having United Nations forces in the field, but by adopting correct United Nations policies and tactics at Lake Success, and correct United States policies re the Far East generally. I added that I was sending a personal letter to Mr. Acheson on this matter, which I hoped would be ready tomorrow.[37] I explained that I was doing this in a personal way, because of our old friendship and because we could both exchange views much more frankly this way than by an official note.

KOREA; REQUEST FOR GROUND FORCES; RECRUITMENT OF SPECIAL FORCE

1. The Prime Minister reported that the U.S. Ambassador had come to St. Patrick's to deliver to him personally a message from the U.S. Government. This message stated that the U.S.S.R. was pursuing a campaign to obscure the United Nations character of the action in Korea and to make it appear that the action was that of the United States alone. To put the matter in its true light, decisive and immediate action was needed from other countries to send ground forces as quickly as possible so that the U.N. character of the operation would be clearly established. It was indicated that early action by the Canadian Government along this line would be much appreciated.

(Aide Mémoire, U.S. Ambassador to the Prime Minister, August 12th, 1950).†

2. Mr. St-Laurent had informed Mr. Woodward that the whole question of Canadian action in relation to the Korean Incident had been carefully considered by the Cabinet and that the result of this examination was embodied in his broadcast of August 7th. The response to the appeal for enlistment in the Canadian Army Special Force had been satisfactory and, with the high proportion of veterans entering, it was possible that training might be expedited. After the special session of Parliament, it might be feasible to place the force under unified command even before completion of training. Mr. Woodward had been informed that the message from the U.S. Government would be placed before the Cabinet and the matter given further study but that no firm action could be expected before Parliament met.

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the Ambassador had subsequently called on him, and that he had taken the opportunity to point out that the character of the action in Korea was being blurred, not only by the Soviet representations, but also by statements and actions in the United States. There was a tendency there to make the action appear as a general Far-Eastern campaign against communism.

4. The Minister of National Defence said that the response to the appeal for enlistment both in the Special and Active Forces continued to be good. As of August 14th, 669 men had been taken on for the Active Force and 3027 for the Special Force; in addition, a further 669 were in the process of examination and applications were continuing at a rate of some 500 a day. 46.6 per cent of applicants were veterans and thus far there had been less than 10 per cent rejection for physical reasons. It appeared that the entire Special Force would be recruited, together with some re-inforcements, and in training at camps by the end of the week. Owing to the high quality of the recruits and the large proportion of veterans, it seemed probable that, with good weather, the individual training of the men might be completed by November 15th. At that time, it might be desirable to have the brigade sent out of Canada, either to camps in the United States or to Japan, for completion of their training. The force should be ready for action about two months after November 15th.

The original establishment for the Special Force involved a total of 4,468 men. It was now suggested that certain special elements from the Second Armoured Regiment, a field squadron of Engineers, a Medical Unit, etc., which would bring the total up to 5,219. Consideration had also to be given to the matter of re-inforcements and to the local quotas for enlistment. As applicants were still coming forward, it was recommended that no local quotas be applied and that men continue to be taken on strength. It would be desirable to recruit sufficient re-inforcements for at least six months.

5. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, noted

(a) the report of the Prime Minister concerning the message from the U.S. Government with regard to the immediate contribution of ground troops in Korea; and,

(b) the report of the Minister of National Defence concerning recruitment of the Canadian Army Special Force and the proposed addition of special elements from the Active Force and agreed that applications for enlistment continue to be received, notwithstanding the completion of local quotas, so long as volunteers continued to come forward.

NATIONAL DEFENCE; ACCELERATED PROGRAMME; CANADIAN ARMY SPECIAL FORCE

13. The Chief of the Naval Staff outlined recommendations for increase in strength of the Royal Canadian Navy under the accelerated defence programme. It called for an increase in complement from 9,600 to 13,440 officers and men over the period to 1953. During that time, it was proposed to put ten ships into commission, mostly for anti-submarine operations. North Atlantic Treaty Organization plans indicated a shortage of 260 anti-submarine escorts and the accelerated naval programme would be a definite contribution toward meeting this deficiency. Commissioning of the Cruiser Uganda was placed last in priority among the vessels concerned. An outline was given of the command arrangements proposed by the North Atlantic Ocean Region Group of the Organization.

14. The Chief of the General Staff reported on planned increases over the present strength of the army to be partially completed by July 1st, 1951. These contemplated bringing the Air-borne Brigade to war strength, provision of a brigade for U.N. operations and additional anti-aircraft artillery. Authorized strength would be increased from 22,000 to 30,800 officers and men.

The Canadian Army Special Force was virtually recruited to strength less reinforcements. It seemed desirable to take on now the number of reinforcements which might be expected to be required for a 12-month period. This would mean recruitment to a strength of 9,979 officers and men. It was expected that the Force would have completed individual training by about November 1st. If it remained in Canada during the winter, training would be slowed down and new barrack accommodation would be required. Winter training could be carried on in the southern or western United States, if accommodation were available or, alternatively, it was probable that accommodation could be secured in Japan. This would enable both winter training and acclimatization of the troops. It might be desirable to make preliminary enquiries of U.S. authorities, on a confidential basis, to see what might be possible. Owing to the fact that previous training of the men in the Force would be on British type equipment, it would slow training down considerably if the Force were to be shifted to American type equipment. It was accordingly recommended that they remain on British equipment and that enquiries be made to ascertain whether the Force could rely on the U.K. supply line from Hong Kong.

It would be desirable to have a senior liaison officer appointed at an early date to headquarters of the U.N. Commander in Japan. It would also be desirable to have the necessary legislative action taken to enable the Special Force to be placed on active service. This would involve a provision that forces could be regarded as on active service when they were used to implement an undertaking by Canada under her international obligations.

In connection with the general army programme, there was need to speed up tooling for the production of vehicles. These would be identical with those produced in the United States. It would involve no expenditure during the current fiscal year but commitment authority to the amount of approximately $15 million.

15. The Minister of National Defence said that the question of equipment for the Special Force raised the question of integration with either U.K. or U.S. forces in Korea. There would be obvious operational advantages in having the Force associated with other forces using British type equipment. An enquiry on this subject had been made by the Acting High Commissioner for the United Kingdom.[38]

16. The Prime Minister said that it seemed clearly desirable to have troops using the same type of equipment associated with one another in the interest of efficiency. At the same time, the formal establishment of any Commonwealth division might suggest that it was the Commonwealth which had obligations to the United Nations and to which the United Nations looked at a time such as the present rather than to the individual country members. It was undesirable that any such precedent be established, and it should be made clear that the association of Commonwealth forces using British type equipment would be for reasons of operational efficiency only.

17. The Chief of the Air Staff described plans for acceleration of the R.C.A.F. programme. These provided for an increase from 2 to 9 squadrons by April, 1953 and additions to the radar system. Approximately 27,000 service personnel would be required to carry out the programme.

It seemed probable that a request would be forthcoming shortly for the provision of facilities for training R.A.F. air crews[39] and a request had been received from the United States for permission to move a group of medium bombers and 2 squadrons of tankers to Goose Bay.[40] It was not clear exactly what purpose the units were to serve.

18. Mr. Claxton believed that it might be desirable, in reply to any request from the United Kingdom for training facilities, to say that Canada would be able to provide facilities for 150 air crew per year after January 1st, 1951, on the understanding that arrangements in subsequent years would be subject to N.A.T.O. overall plans. The grant of training facilities should be a part of mutual aid. In connection with the U.S. request, it might be desirable to get further information, although there should be no hesitation about granting any reasonable request.

Explanatory memoranda were circulated.

(Minister's memoranda to Cabinet Defence Committee, R.C.N. programme, Aug. 17; R.C.A.F. programme, Aug. 17; and National Defence memorandum, Army plans, undated)†

19. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion:

(a) noted with approval the reports concerning plans for acceleration of the programmes of the three armed forces;

(b) agreed that authority be granted for arrangements to be undertaken to speed up tooling for the production of army vehicles; commitment authority up to $15 million to be granted accordingly;

(c) noted the report of the Chief of the General Staff concerning the Special Force and agreed that recruiting be continued up to a total of 9,979 officers and men and that confidential enquiries be initiated to ascertain what arrangements might be made for the transfer on completion of individual training to bases in Japan or the United States for further training; such enquiries to be on the understanding that any transfer would be subject to the authorization by Parliament of the use of the Force in Korea;

(d) agreed that the Special Force be equipped with British type equipment and, if possible, rely on the U.K. supply line from Hong Kong for replacements;

(e) agreed that the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs be authorized to inform the Acting High Commissioner for the United Kingdom that, for reasons of operational efficiency, the Government felt it might be desirable for troops using the same type of equipment to be associated with one another but that it was not considered desirable that any force should be formed or designated as a Commonwealth Division;

(f) agreed that the Minister of National Defence inform the U.K. service authorities that the Canadian Government would be prepared to make available training facilities for 150 air crew in the year beginning January 1st, 1951, and for the extension of such facilities in subsequent years subject to arrangements under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; such facilities to be extended as a part of the assistance to be afforded by Canada under the special appropriation of $300 million; and,

(g) agreed that the Department of National Defence secure further information concerning the request by the United States for permission to transfer medium bombers and tankers to Goose Bay.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au haut-commissaire au Royaume-Uni

Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner in United Kingdom

TELEGRAM 1209 Ottawa, August 24, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL

Following from Heeney, Begins: As you know, proposals for the constitution of a "Commonwealth Division" to fight in Korea have been made in a number of quarters and the idea has been bandied about in the press a good deal. We are worried lest the attitude of the Canadian Government toward such a project should be misunderstood. There is already some evidence that it has been, and even some that our views have been distorted.

2. For this reason we would like you to take an early opportunity of explaining to appropriate U.K. Ministers and officials precisely how the Government have regarded this question and the reasons upon which the Canadian attitude is based.

3. Briefly, the Government position is as follows:

(a) it is clearly of great political importance that operations in Korea should have the aspect of United Nations operations to the maximum possible extent. It is in discharge of obligations under the Charter that our troops will be serving and not in any sense as members of the Commonwealth;

(b) we are not in favour of the constitution of a Commonwealth Division, as such, but we are in favour of troops from the various Commonwealth nations serving in the same divisional formations, and this for obvious reasons of efficiency and convenience. In fact, Canadian military representatives are now discussing means of accomplishing this end with the Unified Command and with the U.K. Military Authorities;

(c) we recognize that the main elements in ground forces using U.K. type equipment will be from the United Kingdom, Australia, Canada and New Zealand. We would hope, however, that elements from other United Nations similarly equipped and trained (even though they may be very small) could be incorporated in the division in which our troops serve; this solely for the reasons stated in sub-paragraph (a) above; and

(d) Canadians will be happy to serve alongside their comrades from the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth nations as they have been accustomed to do in the past, and the Canadian Government have decided that they should do so. But we think that this can be accomplished without sacrificing the political advantage to which we know the U.K. and U.S. Governments as well as we ourselves attach great importance, namely, that to be derived from maximum emphasis on the United Nations character of resistance to aggression in Korea.

4. We realize that when, in fact, forces from the various Commonwealth Nations are brought together it may prove impossible to prevent the press and the public from referring to the division in which they serve as a "Commonwealth Division". Nevertheless, for the reasons stated, we believe that nothing should be done to give official standing or currency to such terminology. We trust therefore that the term will not be used officially or even unofficially by the participants. Perhaps the acceptance at an early stage of some such name as "The United Nations First Division" would help. We would be glad to have U.K. authorities' views on this. Ends.

Reference my telegram No. 1634 of August 28th† re participation of Canadian forces in Korea.

1. We have not yet received comments of Commonwealth Relations Office on suggestions put forward in your telegram No. 1209 of August 24th on this subject. Yesterday, however, Garner mentioned informally to a member of my staff that while the matter was still under consideration here and a reply would be forthcoming, he was very doubtful whether it would be possible for the United Kingdom Government to accept your suggestion that the Division in which Canadian and other Commonwealth forces will be participating should be referred to as "The United Nations First Division". While he made it clear that the United Kingdom Government has not approached the Australian and New Zealand Governments on the basis of your suggestions, he thought there was little doubt that the arguments against the designation of a Commonwealth Division would be unpalatable in Canberra and Wellington. He also added that there were reservations in certain quarters here, although he agreed that it was important that the United Nations aspect of the operations should be stressed. It was possible, he thought that the United Kingdom authorities might propose a compromise on the lines that the designation might be something like "Commonwealth Division — United Nations Forces".

2. I should emphasize, however, that this should not be taken as a formal United Kingdom reply to your proposal, but rather as an intimation of what might be expected.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for Heeney from Reid, Begins: National Defence proposes to send within the next two weeks a military liaison mission to Tokyo. The mission would consist of ten members, with Brigadier Fleury in charge, assisted by four colonels, one major, one cypher man, and NCO's. The original proposal to us contemplated a military mission quite separate from the Canadian Liaison Mission now there, but National Defence officials have now agreed that the head of the military mission should have the dual capacity of military adviser to our head of mission and as liaison officer to GHQ United Nations Command.

2. The immediate purpose of the mission would be to make advance arrangements for the reception of Canadian troops for final training, but the head of mission would have in addition liaison and intelligence functions. Since Canadian troops will be ready for movement from Canada about November 20, National Defence feels that the early departure of a mission is imperative, even though no formal commitment of Canadian forces to Korea has yet been made.

3. It is understood that General Collins[41] wrote General Foulkes, suggesting that a military liaison mission would be desirable. We have also received a letter this week from [Herbert] Norman, urging the despatch of a liaison officer and indicating that an official from MacArthur's headquarters has hinted that such an officer would be welcome.

4. A redraft of the proposed terms of reference for the mission was done in the department, and discussed this morning in a meeting between Mr. Drury, General Graham,[42] and Brigadier Fleury from National Defence, and Ritchie, MacKay, and Menzies from External. At the meeting a very general formula, providing that Brigadier Fleury would be military adviser to Norman and liaison officer with headquarters United Nations Command was worked out. It was further agreed that more complete instructions would be drafted for the meeting of the Chiefs of Staff on Tuesday next. These terms of reference will probably follow closely the redraft of the terms of reference worked out in this Department.

5. At a social gathering on Thursday evening, Mr. Ritchie raised the whole question with Mr. Claxton. He gathered that Mr. Claxton had not seen the original terms of reference submitted to us by National Defence and that he did not favour a military mission separate and distinct from our present mission. It is understood also that since no formal commitment of troops to Korea has yet been made, Mr. Claxton does not wish to give the impression that Fleury's group is an advance party. It is understood, on the other hand, that he feels that for administrative purposes it is essential that the group go forward to make preliminary advance arrangements.

6. Some difficulties may arise over the question of logistic support. As you know, for purposes of supplies, transportation, and other administrative arrangements the Canadian Mission in Japan comes under BCOF. The Canadian forces are likely to be associated with other Commonwealth forces, if for no other reason than that they are using for the most part British-type equipment. Since overtures have been made by U.S. military authorities for a liaison mission and since Canadian troops are likely to be sent to Okinawa rather than Japan proper, it is hoped that the Canadian military mission and Canadian forces when despatched can be kept separate from BCOF, the jurisdiction of which does not appear to extend to Okinawa. In this event, the Canadian military mission would likely come under U.S. forces for administrative purposes.

7. You might wish to have a word with the Minister on the whole matter. Questions on which we should like guidance are:

(a) whether there is any objection to a military mission going forward as proposed within the next two weeks;

(b) whether, if it can be arranged, the Canadian mission should come directly under U.S. jurisdiction rather than indirectly through BCOF;

(c) status of the mission, that is whether independent or with dual capacity of adviser to our Head of Mission and liaison with GHQ United Nations Command;

(d) title for the mission — Mr. Drury appears to favour "Canadian Military Mission"; whereas we have urged "Canadian Military Liaison Mission", which seems to us to provide less opportunities for misunderstanding.

7. See my immediately following telegram for text of formula tentatively agreed to and our redraft of terms of reference. Ends.

2. Following is text of formula for appointment of Canadian military liaison officer tentatively agreed to by officials of National Defence and External. Text begins:

You have been appointed Canadian Military Liaison Officer with the Commander-in-Chief United Nations Forces in the Korean area and Senior Military Adviser to the Head of the Canadian Liaison Mission in Japan.

In your capacity as Canadian Military Liaison Officer you will report to the Chiefs of Staff Committee on military matters, at the same time keeping the Head of the Canadian Liaison Mission informed on major developments. Text ends.

3. It is thought that the above statement might serve as a basis for a press release.

4. Following is text of terms of reference for Canadian Military Liaison Mission to Japan as revised by External. Text begins:

Terms of Reference for Brigadier F.J. Fleury, M.B.E., E.D., who will be the Canadian Military Adviser to the Head of the Canadian Liaison Mission in Japan and the Military Liaison Officer to the Headquarters of the Commander of the United Nations Forces in the Korean area, and who will command "the Canadian Military Liaison Mission", Far East.

(1) You have been appointed Military Adviser to the Head of the Canadian Liaison Mission in Japan (who is the senior Canadian Government representative in the Japan-Korea area) and Canadian Military Liaison Officer to the Headquarters of the Commander of the United Nations Forces in the Korean area. Your duties will be:

(a) to make preliminary preparations for the arrival in the theatre of any Canadian forces;

(b) to report periodically to the Chiefs of Staff on the battle situation and related military matters on the basis of information available in GHQ United Nations Forces;

(c) to keep the Chiefs of Staff informed of United Nations military plans, including expected reinforcements and expected dates of their deployment in the theatre;

(d) to report on tactics and technical equipment used by the enemy or the United Nations forces;

(e) to provide a channel of communication on Canadian military matters between the C-in-C United Nations Forces in Korea, and the Chiefs of Staff, Ottawa;

(f) to advise the Head of the Canadian Liaison Mission in Japan on military matters generally and to keep him informed of the main developments.

(2) It is intended that the Commander 25th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group will be the Senior Canadian Army Officer in the theatre of operations. At no time will you be required to take command of 25th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group in the absence for any reason of the Commander. Text ends.

5. It is expected that the above draft terms of reference will serve as a basis for instructions to be considered at Chiefs of Staff meeting Tuesday, September 19. Ends.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE MAINTENANCE OF CASF

1. Arrangements, as detailed hereunder, for the maintenance of the Canadian Army Special Force during its training and subsequent operations in the Far East have been agreed in Staff conversations between Canadian Army and US Army and are proposed for approval.

2. Subsequent to the report by Minister of National Defence to Cabinet, 15 August 1950, Staff conversations were instituted with US Army in Washington to determine how best the CASF could be provided with certain equipments deficient in Canadian stocks and the extent to which US Army could maintain the CASF from their existing logistic establishments in the Far East.

3. Resulting from these conversations, Staff agreement has been reached to the effect that the US Army will:

(a) Provide and maintain all vehicles except those types of which there are sufficient Canadian stocks and sufficient spare parts for field maintenance.

(b) Provide and maintain wireless equipment, anti-tank rocket launchers, and rockets. Other items, such as field cookers and 60 and 81 mm mortars are expected to become additional items.

(c) Maintain the CASF within continental USA and in far East in food, gasoline, lubricants, and common user supplies.

(d) Move the CASF from American ports, except that Canada will be required to supply sufficient ocean going vessels for the initial cargo list (probably six vessels) and for continuing maintenance thereafter (probably two vessels); vessels to be operated through US movement authorities.

4. US Army will provide a staging camp near Seattle at which units will concentrate and from which they will be embarked for movement to Okinawa for further training there.

5. Invoices for equipment and services supplies to the CASF while in North America will be rendered to the Canadian government by US Army on an actual basis. It is anticipated that, subject to the concurrence of the Theatre Commander, invoices for material and services rendered to the CASF by US Forces in the far East will be on a per capita basis. Costs have not yet been determined.

6. The foregoing, including the financial policies, are recommended to Cabinet for approval.

7. It is further recommended that these arrangements should be ratified through an exchange of notes between Canada and the United States.[43]

COMMITMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES TO KOREA

1. As you know, no formal offer of Canadian forces for Korea has yet been made to the United Nations nor has the Government yet taken a formal decision on the matter, the Order in Council† on the subject being merely permissive.

2. Mr. Heeney requested by telephone on September 21 that a note to the Secretary-General be drafted and sent to the Minister for discussion with his Colleagues during his visit to Quebec. Below is the text telephoned to the office in the Biltmore by Mr. MacKay on the evening of September 21.

3. Both Mr. Heeney and Mr. Drury were of the opinion that the Government would wish to leave the door open for withdrawal of forces from the Far East if when their training was complete there appeared to be no need for them for combat service. On the other hand, the military authorities stressed that it would be necessary to make a definite commitment of the force in order to facilitate arrangements with the U.S. military authorities for final training. The draft below, which was jointly prepared by officials of National Defence and this Department, endeavours to steer between these two views. It will be observed (1) that it reserves to the Canadian Government the right to decide when the force is sufficiently trained for battle service; (2) that it proffers the force for combat service only; and (3) that arrangements for subsequent service in Korea after training will be made with the Unified Command.

4. If you have any comments please send them today, since the draft will probably be discussed by the Ministers over the weekend.

5. Text begins:

I have the honour to refer to my Note of August 14, 1950,† transmitting a copy of the Canadian Prime Minister's statement of August 7, 1950, concerning the recruitment of the Canadian Army's Special Force which would be specially trained and equipped to be available for use in carrying out Canada's obligations under the United Nations Charter or the North Atlantic Treaty. The Prime Minister also indicated that, subject to the approval of the Parliament of Canada, this Special Force would be available for service in Korea as part of the United Nations Forces, if it could be most effectively used in this way when it was ready for service.

I am instructed to inform you that this Special Force has now been recruited and is undergoing training and that Parliament has authorized its use for service with the United Nations Forces in Korea.

The Special Force consists of a brigade group, including three infantry battalions, one field regiment of artillery, one squadron of self-propelled anti-tank guns, together with engineer, signal, medical, ordnance and other services, with appropriate reinforcements.

It is proposed that upon reaching a state of training satisfactory to the Canadian Government this Force will be made available for combat service with the United Nations Forces in Korea as required. If this proposal is acceptable, arrangements for advanced and final training of the Force and for its subsequent service in Korea will be made with the Unified Command. Text ends.

My only comments on the proposed draft note to the Secretary-General offering the Canadian Army special force for combat service in Korea would be that the last paragraph might be improved by omitting the two qualifying phrases "it is proposed that" and "if this proposal is acceptable". A final paragraph might be added if it is desired to indicate that this communication is an offer to which we wish a reply. The final paragraph might simply say: "These proposed arrangements have already been discussed informally with the Unified Command, and I should be grateful if you would confirm the fact that they are acceptable."

2. I think some form of words such as this would not only make a better public impression when the text of the communication is released but would also meet what I take it is the Pentagon's requirement for a formal Canadian offer to be made and accepted before any United States commitment can be undertaken with regard to the supply of United States equipment for the special force.

3. As regards the timing of this communication, I think we should try to get it to the Secretary-General by Monday morning, September 25th, at latest, as it might be useful for the Minister to be able to refer to it in the statement he will probably make on Monday afternoon or Tuesday in the General Assembly. Therefore, if the statement needs Ministerial approval, perhaps it would be possible to have it considered at the meeting of Ministers in Quebec over the weekend.

COMMITMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES TO KOREA

1. As to the wording of the draft note to the Secretary-General, the following two points might be considered:

(a) In the paragraph listing the components of a Brigade Group it would be useful for Public Relations purposes to include the figure of the total first-line strength. Few except military experts have even an approximate idea of what this figure [is] especially in this country where regimental combat teams are the equivalent military formation.

(b) Is it necessary to say in the last sentence more than: "If this proposal is acceptable, the further necessary arrangements for training and service will be made with the Unified Command"? Unless this is done, would it not be logical to expand the reference to subsequent service to something like "possible subsequent combat service"?

2. I realize that we shall be presented with real difficulties if the fighting ends after the force has moved to the Far East but before it is ready for combat duty. Should it then be in an advanced area, such as Okinawa, we would almost certainly encounter pressure, no matter what we say in the formal offer, for it to move to Korea for garrison duty, on the ground that at that stage in the Korean affair it will be quite as important as it is now to have the responsibility shared by stationing troops in the country of members of the United Nations other than the United States. I doubt that a specific offer for combat service only would in fact reduce such pressure, although it might make it easier to strike a bargain which would limit the number of Canadian troops involved, or the time of their service in Korea, or both.

3. I notice from paragraph 6 of Mr. Pearson's report of his discussion with Jessup yesterday (addressed to you as Candel 14 of September 22nd)† that he mentioned equipment difficulties. No such difficulties have been reported to me by the Joint Staff or the Canadian Commercial Corporation here. It would be useful if we could be informed of what their nature is. I should also be glad to know the approximate date at which it is expected that the Special Force will be in a position to move abroad for advanced training.

1. Upon further consideration, and bearing in mind the points raised by Mr. Wrong in his message WA-2263 of September 22nd, I wonder whether we should not make our intentions more explicit, in order to avoid possible disagreeable misunderstandings at a later date. This purpose might be accomplished by my telling the Secretary-General, when presenting the note, what the Canadian Government has in mind in the use of the words "for combat service". Parallel action might also be taken in Washington to tell the State Department informally that, at this stage, we wish to avoid committing ourselves to making the Special Force available for occupation duties in Korea.

2. However, I am inclined to think that we would be better advised to make a more definite statement in the note itself. The first sentence of the last paragraph of your draft might be re-worded as follows:

"Upon reaching a state of training satisfactory to the Canadian Government, this force will be made available for service with the United Nations forces in Korea as required; it should, however, be understood that the present intention of the Canadian Government is that this force should be available for combat service only."

B.C./Vol. 123

Note du ministre de la Défense nationale

Memorandum by Minister of National Defence

[Québec], September 24, 1950

At the Prime Minister's request, a meeting was held in Mr. Garson's room at the Chateau which began at 2.30 and went on until after 6.00. In addition to the Prime Minister and Mr. Garson, Mr. Pearson, Mr. Martin, Mr. Lapointe and Mr. Rinfret were there as well as Mr. Robertson and Mr. Pickersgill.

I first raised a question as to the disposition of the Special Force. For many reasons it had become very urgent for us to make definite arrangements with the United States for movement, final training, supply and accommodation. We had not yet communicated to the Secretary General of the United Nations our intention with regard to the Force. In the absence of this we could not expect the U.S. to make available to us equipment which was also needed elsewhere.

A letter to Mr. Trygve Lie had been prepared by the officials. This letter was then gone over in detail and Mr. Robertson was authorized to have a submission prepared and a note by Council approved authorizing its despatch at once.

I also said that we wanted to make definite arrangements with U.S. Service authorities along the lines that had been discussed.

These were then indicated[44] and the same action was authorized as with the letter.

Mr. Pearson then dealt with the situation at Quebec resulting from discussions with the North Atlantic Treaty nations.[45]

The United States had advanced the idea of a reintegrated force. All twelve nations had approved this in principle. The only point of issue was the re-arming of Western Germany. On this the French had so far been adamant. The other nations took the contrary stand.

I pointed out that our supporting the concept of an integrated force created a clear moral obligation to supply troops for that force. They had already planned to have one squadron of fighters undergo operational training in the United Kingdom early in 1951. We could probably add to these another squadron that year equipped with F.86's and a third with Vampires which at least could be borrowed from the United Kingdom.

We had raised and were training a special force for Korea. For the Special Force we have specially enlisted about 9,000 men and we were proposing to post another 1,000 from the active force. Altogether the Special Force and its reinforcements would total over 10,000 and if fighting continued in Korea, it would be the second largest western force fighting there, possibly equalling in total numbers the U.K., Australian and New Zealand forces put together.

In total numbers again it would be considerably bigger than the average German or Russian division, though very differently composed.

If this force did not go to Korea but was grouped with the Airborne Brigade Group and other elements in the active army such as the two armoured regiments, the additional artillery units, engineers, signals, etc., from existing formations, we would have a total of somewhere between 17,000 and 19,000 men which would constitute a good size division for peacetime.

The military value of having this act as a division in Canada would hardly justify the expense and trouble of putting it together. It could only be done in summer. It would be possible to form the elements into three brigade groups, the elements of which could undergo training at the brigade group in summer.

It would not be possible, I thought, to send the Special Force to Korea if that meant engaging in active fighting with the consequent necessity of supplying reinforcement and inevitably building up a growing supply line and at the same time send troops to Europe.

We could, however, put this on an "either or" basis. If the troops did not go to Korea, they could go to Europe.

We could send part to each place.

A decision as to the disposition of the Force would have to be made very soon, within a matter of a very few weeks, in order to arrange for accommodation, transport, equipment, completion of training, etc.

There is no place in Canada where the whole force could be put together in winter quarters. We were pressing on with the winterization of additional quarters at Valcartier, Petawawa and Wainwright, so that if necessary the force could be accommodated in Canada.

It was very desirable, however, to get the force, or a large part of it, going just as soon as advanced training was completed about the middle of November. Otherwise with the removal of the Korean incentive we would likely be faced with considerable difficulty in maintaining morale and discipline.

If the Korean incident was settled in favour of the United Nations and if the Russians showed signs of politeness, or even a willingness to discuss co-operation, the international temperature would be likely to climb sharply and it might be very difficult indeed for us to maintain the present rate of recruiting.

This was just sufficient for the Navy and for Air Force aircrew at the present low scale but not nearly sufficient for groundcrew for the Air Force. Also the 40% increase in ceilings meant an almost corresponding increase in the number of officers. What had been a relatively satisfactory position in June had become a position of acute shortage in August.

If we sent forces abroad, we would be faced with the necessity of supporting them. The reduction in size might be very difficult. We must therefore recognize, as I pointed out to the Cabinet twice before, that embarking on this line might mean selective service in peacetime if we were to avoid the discomfiture of failing to do what we had undertaken. Personally, I thought that could not be contemplated and consequently we should recognize that if this course were undertaken and if recruits were not forthcoming in sufficient numbers, this might mean selective service.

I also pointed out that the developments since Korea would involve considerable changes in defence planning. We are examining the possibility of carrying out these increased activities without a corresponding increase in administrative staffs by even working to get a decrease through possible curtailment of reserve forces through the complete discontinuance of relatively inactive units. The Prime Minister doubted that this would be possible. He felt that we would probably have to maintain the reserve units and the increased activities would probably result in an increase of staff.

I felt, however, that we should see again if we should not go further with the plans of the balanced force. For example, we might sharply curtail the Navy. Our Navy was so small anyway and its purpose was so entirely defensive that it could not contribute much by way of deterrent. Today all North Atlantic Treaty nations must think first in terms of deterrents rather than a build-up of forces to win.

I recognized that if Mr. Pearson supported the principles of this integrated force as I felt he must, this would constitute a moral obligation to send men to Europe. Those present agreed that this was the right course.

I pointed out that in view of the Prime Minister's statement about this to Parliament and of the undertakings that had been given, it was highly desirable that none of us should in any way indicate the possibility of this development until he had done this himself, probably after a full Cabinet meeting and a full discussion.

I also pointed out one of the inescapable dangers of association in the present league. Mr. Pearson I know had experienced precisely the same thing and it was inevitable.

This was the tendency on the part of everyone of the other countries and particularly of the United States itself to think of the desirability of the Canadian effort always in terms of a fixed fraction of the U.S. effort.

Canada was the only country in a comparable position. We certainly had the second highest standard of living and were richest in natural resources. Consequently we should make the same proportionate contribution as the United States.

Very few people even know that that contribution in proportion to population should be as low as 1/11th or 1/12th, or in proportion to national or individual income, some much smaller figure, say 1/18th.

On all occasions we must fight against the fairness of such comparison.

Mr. Pearson agreed whole heartedly with this.

1. My immediately following telegram† contains the text of note which I shall hand to the Secretary-General either this afternoon or tomorrow morning, depending on when it is possible for me to see him.

2. With regard to paragraphs 3 and 4 of telegram under reference, Minister has asked me to call to the attention of the Secretary-General the fact that we attach significance to the term "combat service" in the last paragraph of the note. I shall therefore draw this phrase to the attention of the Secretary-General and remark that the special force is intended for combat service, and that if, when its training has been completed, the situation in Korea is one which requires garrison or occupation duty only, further consideration may have to be given to the disposition of the forces. The Minister considers that you may wish to make some similar comment in Washington in making copy of the note available to the State Department.

3. In conversations with both Jessup and Rusk during the past few days, the Minister has mentioned the possibility that, if hostilities had ceased in Korea by the time the Canadian special force was trained, it might be preferable to use them elsewhere, perhaps in Europe. On both occasions he said that he did not think it possible for us to maintain a force of this size both in Korea and in Europe. At this point, Rusk volunteered the comment that it might indeed make a great deal more sense for us to send our special force to Europe if by that time the emergency were over in Korea.

4. I shall let you know as soon as I have given note to the Secretary-General and shall also let you know what arrangements he will make for publishing it.

Reference our telegram No. 1209 of August 24 and your telegrams Nos. 1634 of August 28† and 1723 of September 7 concerning the designation to be given to non-United States formations which may operate in Korea.

1. It seems to us that the use of the term "Commonwealth Division" would be exclusive in practice and might well make it difficult to include in it small detachments from other countries which might very well be using U.K. type equipment. In any case there would appear to be no very strong reason for inclusion of the Canadian force in such an organization since the Canadian force will be largely a self-contained combat unit except for supplies. It will include a brigade group, including three infantry battalions, one field regiment of artillery, one squadron of self-propelled anti-tank guns, together with engineer, signal, medical, ordnance and other services, with appropriate reinforcements. Moreover, in view of the close working relations between Canadian and U.S. Services, it will be more feasible for us to make direct arrangements with the Unified Command for advance training and commitment to combat service.

2. There is one further argument against the establishment of a "Commonwealth Division" which was not touched upon in telegram No. 1209 but which might be worth mentioning to the Commonwealth Relations Office. It concerns the possible disadvantages of sending a Commonwealth formation to fight in Asia at a time when none of the Asian members of the Commonwealth is likely to contribute troops to such a formation. On the basis of information available to us, neither India nor Pakistan would feel impelled, by the establishment of a "Commonwealth Division", to contribute combat troops to fight in Korea, although both countries might well, in such circumstances, be placed in an invidious position by their inability to do so. At a time when every effort is being made to give India and Pakistan leading roles in the settlement of Asian problems, it would seem inadvisable to take any step which might embarrass them. Furthermore, since there is no assurance that either country would participate in a "Commonwealth Division" for Korea, the organization of such a formation might give the Soviet Union an opportunity to point out to the other Asian peoples that the Commonwealth had failed to persuade its two most influential Asian members to go along with it in this important matter. Any such outcome would obviously be dangerous and would, it seems to us, serve to play down unnecessarily the United Nations character of operations in Korea.

3. Although we are, for the reasons given in telegram No. 1209 and in the foregoing paragraphs, opposed to the term "Commonwealth Division", we have nevertheless been unable, so far, to hit upon a suitable alternative title for a formation which will include elements of widely varying nationalities and geographical areas. We are afraid that the title "United Nations First Division" would not be acceptable to the Americans who, after all, were the first and until British troops arrived recently, the only United Nations troops assisting those of the Republic of Korea under the Unified Command. On the whole I am inclined to think that it would be preferable to do nothing at this stage about a title and to depend on the newspaper correspondents to reach their own solution.

PRIME MINISTER'S KINGSTON SPEECH

Following for the Minister only from the Under-Secretary, Begins: Following our telephone conversation this morning I spoke to both Mr. Claxton and Pickersgill and it appears that the Prime Minister spoke from a prepared text given to the press "not to be released before delivery about 9 p.m., September 30." The speech was given before the annual meeting of the Royal Military College Club of Canada and the press report in the Gazette of October 2 is accurate.

2. Both Mr. Claxton and Pickersgill agreed that we should have been consulted in advance. Pickersgill wishes me to convey his sincere apology to you for not having let us see a copy of the draft text which was prepared during last week.

3. At the same time, both Mr. Claxton and Pickersgill were surprised that we felt that Mr. St. Laurent's remarks went further than any authoritative sources had gone so far concerning the employment of Canadian troops in Europe. I pointed out to them that public reference to the availability of the Special force "for service as part of a deterrent force in Europe" had not been made authoritatively hitherto; further, you had been careful at NATO meetings not to commit the Government in this particular respect.

4. My immediately following message contains textual extracts from Mr. St. Laurent's speech. The complete text† will go forward by air mail today.

5. In speaking to Mr. Claxton and Pickersgill I made it clear, of course, that we were not objecting to the substance of the Prime Minister's statement; quite the contrary, what he said was in line with your own thinking. Ends.

PRIME MINISTER'S KINGSTON SPEECH

The following extract from the Prime Minister's address to the Annual Meeting of the Royal Military College Club on September 30 concerns his reference to the availability for service in Europe of the Canadian Army Special Force.

Extract Begins:

At the present time the Force is being trained for service in Korea, if that seems to be the right place to send it when it is trained and ready. But there are other areas in the world; for what has happened in Korea might be repeated, and it might be that our Special Force would be despatched to some entirely different place if circumstances warranted and Parliament approved.

"Provided the Korean incident is successfully terminated before too long a time has elapsed, the Special Force would be available for service as part of a deterrent force in Europe, if its employment there would fit in effectively with the joint plans." Meanwhile, as you all know, the most important obstacle to the creation on the Continent of Europe of extensive ground forces is the shortage of equipment and of the capacity to produce equipment, weapons and supplies. I don't need to tell you either that, speaking generally, it takes longer to get into large-scale production than it does to train men to a fighting pitch. For the immediate future, therefore, so far as Europe is concerned, there is a most urgent need for military supplies to be put into the hands of the men who are already there.

Now I must admit I have been rather surprised to see that this point has been misinterpreted in certain quarters and that it has been suggested that Canadians are going to be too busy producing munitions to do any of the fighting. It seems to me Canada's proud record of participation in two world wars is a simple and sufficient answer to any such suggestion. But at present there is no fighting going on in Europe, and what we are concerned about is trying to prevent another war starting over there, and that means putting up the best possible evidence of united ability and readiness to resist and overcome any possible aggression. Extract ends. Message ends.

VII. SPECIAL FORCE

17. The Minister of National Defence reported that the Special Force was practically up to strength with about 5,000 officers and men plus 4,500 reinforcement. It would complete basic training about November 2nd. Approximately another three months, depending on various factors, would be required before it was completely trained and ready to fight. If it was not dispatched to Korea, a decision would have to be made whether it would winter in Canada or outside the country. The United States were anxious that the occupation forces in Korea might be of a genuinely international character and consequently would welcome Canadian participation. However, it might not be desirable for the whole force to do occupation duty there, but a detachment around battalion size might be made available. The remainder could, if necessary, be accommodated at various camps in this country.

Because of the climate and because they would have to be dispersed in small groups, it would not be possible to advance training very rapidly in Canada. Service authorities had discussed briefly and informally with Americans the possibility of the force training as a group in the south-western United States. The force had been recruited with the intention of serving outside the country and, from a point of view of morale, it would be desirable for the men to complete their training elsewhere than Canada. In addition, in the United States they could complete formation training in a suitable climate. A large amount of the equipment of the Special Force was of U.S. design and it would be both practicable and valuable to have the force train with American formations. As considerable preparations and plans were necessary before any of the courses open for the disposition of the force could be adopted, it might be necessary to take some preliminary decisions within the next two or three weeks.

18. The Chief of the General Staff said that American authorities were in the process of considering plans for composition of the occupation forces in Korea. It was understood that an attempt would be made to include as large a percentage of Asiatics as possible. The ultimate decision regarding the nature of the Korean force would be made by the U.N. authorities and any official request for Canadian participation would come from that quarter. In any case, the American military authorities were anxious that we defer any decision regarding participation until the matter had been given further consideration.

With regard to a large part of the Special Force wintering in Canada, General Foulkes said that it would be necessary to provide the men with winter equipment at a cost of approximately $250 each. This equipment would not be necessary if the force were dispatched to Europe. Further, while accommodation could be provided, it would be crowded and might lead to the spread of colds and other infections.

19. The Prime Minister suggested that the force had been raised for the purpose of the U.N. and that it would be extremely difficult to resist any request from the latter to participate, to some extent at least, in the occupation of Korea.

20. Mr. St-Laurent asked if there was any indication as to how quickly American detachments might be made available to the integrated force in Europe.

21. General Foulkes said that he understood that five National Guard divisions had been called up pending clarification of the situation in Korea. These were still in a state of training but, when suitable arrangements could be made, would probably be sent to Europe. It was unlikely that any troops would be dispatched before the first of the year and they would probably not go in any quantity until at least the spring.

It was suggested that, from a military point of view, the smallest unit the Supreme Commander would consider desirable as a contribution from member nations to the integrated force would be a division. While the whole force would be an international one, if possible it would be better not to have individual divisions made up of a number of national components. The Special Force that Canada had raised, together with its reinforcements, which would not be required as such if the force went to Europe, could be provided in the form of a small training division.

22. Mr. St-Laurent said that Canadian public opinion would not be prepared to support the dispatch of one Canadian division in the near future in the light of the probable American programme for participation. While the latter might ultimately provide twelve or more divisions it would be unwise for Canada to assume obligations in Europe too far ahead of other countries. There was always the possibility that a Canadian force might be overwhelmed as a result of action occurring sooner than was anticipated. The right contribution for Canada to make in the way of manpower should be somewhere between one-twelfth and one-fifteenth of what the United States was doing.

23. Mr. Claxton pointed out that from the point of view of total effort with respect to manpower and finance, the Canadian effort would not come close to one-twelfth or one-fifteenth of that being put forward by the United States.

24. General Foulkes said that it was intended that the size of the integrated force for Western Europe would be between thirty and forty divisions. The United States believed that this kind of force was the only possible deterrent to Russian aggression. It was anticipated that the French would contribute something like fifteen divisions and the Dutch four divisions.

25. Mr. St-Laurent said that the public would inevitably compare Canada's contribution in terms of the American contribution and that they would look on the integrated force as something separate and apart from the total defence effort of the various member countries.

26. The Minister of Agriculture suggested that if the Special Force were to train in the United States in advance of any publicly stated decision to dispatch them abroad and if, during the period of their training, American divisions were being sent to Europe, there might be some hostility to members of the Canadian force from the American public.

27. Mr. St-Laurent said that, as it appeared unlikely that there would be any substantial movement out of the United States at the time the Canadians were being moved there, this difficulty would probably not arise.

He suggested that we continue to investigate where the Canadian Special Force might be most usefully trained and employed, on the grounds that it had been raised to meet our obligations under the United Nations or the North Atlantic Treaty and that it was important to have it train with other international forces, so as to be ready to fill its intended role. This should be done as expeditiously and sensibly as possible. We had said that it was our intention to make it ready for Korea or elsewhere in discharging our international obligation. If this necessitated training outside Canada, it did not appear that any departure from announced government policy was involved. If, however, in conformity with joint plans, a decision was reached to send it elsewhere than Korea, it would be necessary to consult Parliament.

In this connection, the Prime Minister submitted the following excerpt from a speech which he was to make the next day to the Canadian Industrial Preparedness Association, stating the government's policy with regard to the disposition of the Special Force.

"The aggression in Korea was the immediate occasion for the creation of the Canadian Army Special Force, but from the first move to establish that force it has been made clear that it was being created to be available to assist without undue delay in discharging Canadian obligations under the United Nations Charter and the North Atlantic Treaty. As I said at the Royal Military College in Kingston last week, the force is now being trained for service in Korea and it will be sent to Korea if that still seems to be the right place to send it when it is ready for service.

But it may be that circumstances will make it expedient to employ this special force in some other area and, if circumstances make such a course seem advisable in the interest of increasing the common security of ourselves and of our allies, the government will not hesitate to recommend to Parliament that this force be employed elsewhere. I also indicated last week — and this was implicit in our plans from the beginning — that the Special Force, if it were not needed in Korea, would be available for service with forces of our North Atlantic partners wherever it might best fit into any overall planning; that might well mean its employment in Europe if that is what best fits into the joint plans when those joint plans have taken definite shape.

I am sure we all recognize that the armed forces of Canada must be appropriately represented in the integrated force which is to be established by the North Atlantic Alliance. But it is of the utmost importance to be realistic about these matters. Any military force which we can send to Europe when there is no war going on in Europe will, of necessity, be a very small part of the combined strength in being of the North Atlantic powers if that strength is to be substantial enough to make potential aggressors think twice before they start anything."

28. The Committee, after further discussion:

(a) approved the statement on the government's policy with regard to the Special Force, to be included in the speech to the Canadian Industrial Preparedness Association on October 6, as submitted by the Prime Minister;

(b) agreed that the appropriate authorities continue to investigate where the Canadian Special Force might most usefully train in order to conform with the government's policy of discharging our obligations under the U.N. and the North Atlantic Treaty.

Your telegram No. 1209 of August 24 regarding proposals for the constitution of a "Commonwealth Division".

As you are aware, the views as set forth in your telegram under reference were left with the Commonwealth Relations Office on August 28 in the form of an aide mémoire† embodying the points in your message. The additional points outlined in paragraphs 1 and 2 of your telegram No. 1427 of September 26 were also brought to the attention of the Commonwealth Relations Office.

2. In reply, the Commonwealth Relations Office has given us to-day an aide mémoire which outlined the discussion which has been proceeding between United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand on the grouping of their respective contingents in Korea, and which deals with the two principal points raised in your telegram under reference: (1) the question of nomenclature, and (2) the possible addition of foreign troops. Attached to the aide mémoire is an annex outlining the arrangements for control, command and rearward administration of the proposed United Kingdom/Australian/New Zealand brigade group.

3. The text of the United Kingdom aide mémoire and annex is contained in my immediately following telegram.

4. In handing this aide mémoire to us to-day, Garner explained that the substance of it had been prepared prior to the receipt of your additional comments outlined in telegram No. 1427 of September 26.

5. It is quite clear that the problems of grouping and designation discussed in the United Kingdom aide mémoire will only be actual on the assumption that the Canadian force now being trained is required to proceed to Korea. Much will also depend on the composition of the United Nations force and its role in Korea under the terms of the United Kingdom resolution now being discussed at Lake Success.

6. In the event that the Canadian special force proceeds to Korea there would seem to be three possible courses open for its employment:

I. Inclusion in a Commonwealth divisional formation on the broad lines of the United Kingdom proposal;

II. To operate as an independent brigade group;

III. Inclusion in a United States division.

7. In the case of the first course, to offset the difficulties of nomenclature there would be the advantage that the United Kingdom would be responsible for the logistic support of the Canadian special force.

8. In the case of the second course, it must be borne in mind that the United Kingdom might object to undertaking to provide logistic support for the Canadian special force.

9. In the case of the third course, if the Canadian special force were to operate as part of a United States division there would be considerable difficulty in providing it with United Kingdom type equipment.

10. I should be grateful for your comments in due course.

Repeat to Washington and New York.
My immediately preceding telegram. Following is text of United Kingdom aide mémoire, Begins:

D.3190/66. Secret.

Aide Mémoire

The United Kingdom Government have made a careful study of the aide mémoire communicated by the High Commissioner for Canada on 28th August, relating to the arrangements which might be made for brigading together the land contingents which Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom have sent, or are proposing to send, for service as part of the United Nations forces in Korea.

2. In view of the great successes recently gained by the United Nations forces it may be that present plans for the training and despatch of troops to Korea will have to be modified, but on the assumption that land contingents from the four countries may still find themselves engaged in operations there, the United Kingdom is most anxious to reach agreement in principle with the other governments both on the question whether the four contingents should be joined in a single force, and, if it is decided that they should be so joined, on the various consequential problems that arise.

3. Discussions on these questions have been proceeding between Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom and agreement in principle has been reached between these three Governments that their respective contingents should be grouped together as an expanded brigade group under a United Kingdom Commander (who will of course come under United States operational control). This expanded brigade group would consist of:

(1) 29 Brigade Group from the United Kingdom

(2) The Australian infantry battalion now in Korea;

(3) One New Zealand field regiment R.A.

When 29 Brigade Group reaches Korea it is intended that the two United Kingdom infantry battalions (which were moved as a matter of urgency from Hong Kong) at present fighting there, under Brigadier Coad, should be withdrawn.

4. The United Kingdom Government have given their provisional agreement to the arrangements for the maintenance, rearward administration and non-operational control of this joint United Kingdom/Australian/New Zealand brigade group which are set out in the annex to this aide mémoire. The United Kingdom's endorsement of these arrangements is provisional only since it is clear that they may require reconsideration in the event of the Canadian Government's deciding that the Canadian Army special force should be joined with the contingents from the three other countries. We have suggested to Australia and New Zealand that they and we should arrange forthwith to study at the official level the details of the arrangements set out in the annex. But pending an indication of Canada's wishes we have recommended to the other two Governments that no public statement should be made by Australia, New Zealand or ourselves about the arrangements so far discussed between us, and that for the moment none of us should make any communication about these arrangements to the United States Government. We have heard from the New Zealand Government that they agree. A reply from Australia is awaited.

5. As the Canadian Government will be aware the Indian Government have offered a field ambulance unit for service with the United Nations forces in Korea. We have asked the Indian Government whether they would be prepared to link their ambulance unit with whatever Commonwealth force for Korea is formed, but have not yet had a reply.

6. The United Kingdom Government share the Canadian Government's view that for reasons of efficiency and convenience there is much to be said for troops from the various Commonwealth nations serving together. They greatly appreciate the statement in the Canadian Government's aide mémoire that Canadians will be happy to serve alongside their comrades from the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom Government would welcome agreement in principle to an arrangement whereby the Canadian special force and the United Kingdom/Australian/New Zealand brigade group might be joined together to form a single division, if this should become militarily necessary in the future, and we should be glad to learn as soon as possible whether the Canadian Government agree to do this.

7. If so, it will of course be necessary for the Governments concerned (including India, if they decide to link their ambulance unit with the other Commonwealth forces) to reach agreement on consequential arrangements. As regards the measures that will be required for non-operational control and maintenance for the joint force, the United Kingdom authorities would be glad to learn from the Canadian authorities how far, and in what specific ways, the latter consider the arrangements already provisionally agreed between the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand in respect of the administration of the proposed expanded brigade group would need modifying if the Canadian Army special force were added so as to form a new division.

8. As regards the two points raised in the Canadian Government's aide mémoire of 25th August (viz. (1) the question of nomenclature, and (2) the possible addition of foreign troops), the United Kingdom Government are in entire agreement with the Canadian Government in attaching importance to the United Nations aspect of the operations in Korea. In the same way as Canada, the United Kingdom are taking part in the fighting as a result of their adherence to the United Nations Security Council's resolutions. But since the whole operation in Korea is a United Nations responsibility it would, in the United Kingdom's view, be illogical to call one division taking part in it a United Nations division when the others were not also so named. Moreover there is a practical difficulty. It does not seem possible to the United Kingdom authorities to omit the word "Commonwealth" from the title of a division which would be mainly, or as we would prefer, wholly composed of troops from the Commonwealth. A division so composed would inevitably be called a Commonwealth division by its own members and by the public and it would in the view of the United Kingdom Government be fruitless to attempt to enforce a title omitting this word. We would, however, be very ready to agree to some such title as "First (Commonwealth) Division, United Nations Forces", if this would help to meet the Canadian Government's point.

9. As regards the addition of foreign troops the United Kingdom Government as at present advised think that this course would present considerable practical disadvantages. Difficulties would arise in respect of language, equipment, procedure, training and maintenance which would inevitably have repercussions on the efficiency of the force and the speed with which it could be got ready for active operations. The United Kingdom Government, for their part, would accordingly much prefer not to add foreign troops.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR CONTROL, COMMAND AND REARWARD ADMINISTRATION OF PROPOSED UNITED KINGDOM/AUSTRALIAN/NEW ZEALAND BRIGADE GROUP

1. Composition and Organization.

(a) The following forces will be supplied by the three Governments:

United Kingdom—One brigade group plus one armoured regiment.
Australia—One infantry battalion.
New Zealand—One field artillery regiment with small force H.Q.

(b) These forces will be organized as an expanded brigade group under the United Kingdom Brigade Groups Commander.

2. Base Organizations. As much as possible will be made of the existing British Commonwealth Occupation Force (B.C.O.F.) base in Japan. Some form of forward base in Korea will also be required. Exact form of these base organizations to be settled after discussion with Unified Command.

3. Control and Command. Higher operational control of the force will be exercised by the Unified Command. Commander-In-Chief B.C.O.F. to be responsible for non-operational control and the general administration of the force. Directions to Commander-In-Chief, B.C.O.F. to be issued through the Australian Chiefs of Staff in Melbourne working in conjunction with military representatives of the other Commonwealth Chiefs of Staff concerned, and on behalf of these Chiefs of Staff. On routine matters not requiring reference to the Australian Chiefs of Staff, each Commonwealth War Department would communicate direct with Commander-In-Chief B.C.O.F. Latter's directive would make it clear that for this purpose he will be the representative of each Commonwealth War Department.

4. Supply and Finance Problems. These should be studied on the officials level with the object of formulating agreed recommendations to Governments.

5. General. Units will retain their national identity and their internal administration will be in conformity with their national regulations and conditions of service. Ends.

Extrait du procès-verbal d'une réunion

Extract from Minutes of a Meeting

SECRET Ottawa, October 24, 1950

Notes of a meeting held in the Conference Room, East Block, on Monday, October 23, 1950, at 10:30 a.m. between representatives of the Department of External Affairs (Messrs. Reid, MacKay, Menzies and Duder) and representatives of the services (including Major-General Graham, Major-General Macklin, and Air Commodore Godfrey) to hear a report by Mr. Norman, Head of the Canadian Mission in Japan, on the situation in the Far East.

In the Chair: Mr. Escott Reid.

Mr. Norman, reporting on his recent interview with General MacArthur, at which Brigadier Fleury had also been present, said that there now seemed little point in sending Canadian troops to train at Okinawa. Construction for accommodation for Canadian forces at the base there had been stopped pending settlement of the question of payment. General MacArthur was not greatly concerned over the arrival or non-arrival of Canadian troops, since the combat phase of the war was nearly over. General Robertson (BCOF) had told Brigadier Fleury that he thought it would be useful if Canada were to send a battalion of regular troops direct to Korea. (At this point Major-General Graham announced that the latest order was to send the Canadian advance party to Pusan). Mr. Norman, continuing his report, said that General MacArthur intended to withdraw the 8th Army by Thanksgiving, and to cut down to a minimum the number of combat troops in the occupying force.

In reply to a question, Mr. Norman said that the fighting was practically over and that there was little danger of successful guerrilla warfare later on. He considered that the Northern frontier could not be completely closed and he could not say whether or not there would be a no-man's land between Korea and Manchuria. It was difficult to say what Russia's reaction to the presence of an unfriendly power in the North would be; any Russian military reaction would now be too late, and the South Korean forces could probably take care of any initial threat and of annoying border tactics. It was General MacArthur's view that in time Korea would go Communist as a result of the pressure of Communist China.

Major-General Graham asked whether the occupying force would have trouble with the South Koreans, to which Mr. Norman replied that President Rhee would not be easy to work with because he considered his government the only lawful one of the whole of Korea and would resent any interference in internal affairs. At this moment Mr. Menzies intervened to give an account of the pre-war political background of Korea. He agreed that Rhee would certainly take over North Korea and that some sort of compromise might have to be worked out, e.g., occupation troops, not labelled as such, might be stationed in North Korea to give the impression that a reasonably just administration in the name of the United Nations was being conducted there.

Mr. Norman added that President Rhee had said he would welcome U.N. forces for a short while to help with civilian relief and reconstruction. Mr. Norman was quite sure that any election would go in favour of Rhee's party; if Rhee had his way such an election would be confined to the 100 seats left vacant in the R.O.K. for North Korean representation.

After some discussion of the suitability of the Canadian Special Force men for occupational duties, Mr. Reid proposed that a joint memorandum be prepared for consideration by the Cabinet on Wednesday. This memorandum might include:

(a) A firm offer of Canadian participation in an integrated force for Western Europe;

(b) A not so firm mention that Canada was considering with the Unified Command some contribution to the occupational force for Korea.

The possibility of sending a group of men to do a specialized construction job in Korea was put forward by Mr. Menzies. A/C Godfrey considered that the parcelling out of the Special Force in any such way would cause great difficulties in administration, supply, and the keeping up of morale.

Mr. Norman's suggestion that the Government might issue a statement to the effect that the Special Force was not considered suitable for the purposes of occupation but that it had under consideration the sending of a battalion of well-trained and seasoned troops was not supported by the representatives of the Department of National Defence.

In closing the meeting Mr. Reid referred the question of a joint memorandum to the two departments concerned.

My dear Prime Minister,

At the Cabinet tomorrow I thought I should put before our colleagues the main points that are likely to arise in connection with the Washington meetings.[46]

To assist in the discussion I enclose a draft paper which, if you approve, might be distributed.[47]

I also enclose a copy of a signal just received from Brigadier Fleury, our liaison officer in Tokyo. I doubt if we can expect General MacArthur ever to say that he doesn't want our troops or any part of them.

[46] Voir Chapitre 5, 6e Partie./See Chapter 5, Part 6.
[47] Voir le document 829./See Document 829.

It seems to me

(1) we should decide if possible Wednesday not to send the whole brigade group to Korea;

(2) we should try to secure from the U.S. at Washington a telegram saying that the brigade group was not necessary "for combat", which would make it perfectly clear that we could say what part of the force, if any, was to be used for occupation;

(3) if we cannot get an indication from the U.N. or U.S. that the force is not needed for combat, we might have to delay announcing this until it was clear that hostilities were over;

(4) we should not send the whole force to Korea, but decide Wednesday to send a battalion or possibly part of a battalion with engineer, medical and communications units.

I am trying to get Hume Wrong now to discuss next moves with him.

Yours faithfully,

GHQ approve movement special force direct Pusan Korea instead of Okinawa.

Am sending Sare Crue Whitigar Bowen [corruption]ared to Pusan earliest to reconnaise and make preliminary arrangements. I propose joining them later this week.

2. As notified previously there is no repeat no likelihood special force arriving in time for taking part in active operations in Korea. Barring the unexpected intervention direct by Russia or China fighting in Korea should be over in few days except for (a) mopping up guerilla bands and (b) possible strong points which G2 thinks may develop around hydro project at Sinuiju and Pyoktong and around warm water ports near north east tip of Korea. Former important to China and latter to Soviet Union. This will have to be attacked frontally if they develop. Canadians are cruelly doomed to occupation role. This may be shaped of necessity but in my view will constitute logistical and morale headache of major proportion. I can but recommend strongly that no repeat no troops be sent under present circumstances. If occupation alliance must be accepted I would suggest size force be reduced acceptable minimum. I see little possibility that Gen MacArthur will suggest cutting down Canadian contribution and still less that he will suggest cancelling despatch.

25 CIB. This would be self inflicted wound. He wants to get as many USA troops as possible out of Korea as quickly as he can. Every non USA battalion he gets for occupation duties means one less battalion committed to this unwelcomed task. For political reasons too he thinks Canadians should care in the occupation. However I feel confident Gen MacArthur would not repeat not be greatly upset following alteration of [corruption] announcing Canadian contribution will be cut down to say one infantry battalion. I cannot guess what his reaction would be if you suddenly announced cancellation. Much would depend on timing and wording. Herbert Norman is in good position to advise on this feature.

5. As I see it you must sabotage (take ??) initiative. There is no repeat no reason Gen MacArthur to make a move. He is in solid position simply awaiting arrival Canadian troops as scheduled. If you so direct I will ask him to make his view known to Washington but I fear any alterations (in our ???) suggestions will not repeat not be well received and result in his sending for whole brigade group.

6. I have just come from interview Gen MacArthur's C of S General Hickey. Foregoing remarks condensation his advice and reactions in addition to the information from the CO Pacific Coast source and my personal conclusions.

7. Would be grateful for more up to date information and direction on calculations and plans as they concern my mission. Your tel under reply contains only consequential advice received since I left other than apart Vice Chief's GS 258 of Oct 11. Have uneasy feeling I may be operating partly in darkness and thus running into trouble. I assume past month must have produced some changes in policy or other (???) which may affect reports here.

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

EMPLOYMENT OF SPECIAL FORCE

Following for Honourable Brooke Claxton from Wrong, Begins: After our conversation this morning I got in touch with General Foulkes at the Military Committee meeting. He was able to speak to General Bradley during an intermission. General Bradley told him that the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff had yesterday approved a recommendation that the Special Force should not go to Korea. He added, however, that this had to be taken up with the State Department because of that Department's responsibilities during the occupation period, and that General Gruenther was responsible for clearing the recommendation with the State Department.

2. I think that this can only mean that the Unified Command considers that the Special Force is not needed in Korea for combat service — an opinion based on military grounds.

3. I spoke early this afternoon to Assistant Secretary Perkins with whom I had had a conversation about the employment of the Special Force about a fortnight ago, when I gave him a copy of the formal Canadian offer addressed to the United Nations. I explained to Perkins the need for an early decision. He had not himself heard from the Pentagon about the action taken by the Joint Chiefs but he seemed confident that he would be able to let me know the outcome in time for the meeting of the Cabinet on Wednesday. I shall telephone as soon as I hear from him. Ends.

NATIONAL DEFENCE; CANADIAN ARMY SPECIAL FORCE

3. The Minister of National Defence said that, as hostilities appeared to be almost over in Korea, a decision had to be made in the very near future as to the disposition of the Canadian Army Special Force. It appeared that in present circumstances, if any part of the Force was to go to Korea it should go direct, saving the considerable expense of putting a camp in shape on Okinawa. The question, however, arose as to whether the whole or any part of the Force should go to Korea to police the country while order was being restored.

4. Mr. Claxton said that it was General MacArthur's intention to remove a considerable proportion of U.S. troops within the next two months, leaving a relatively small occupation force. U.N. and U.S. authorities were anxious that the occupying force should be representative of nations in addition to the United States. If Canadian troops were required for pacification duties, their participation might take the form of one battalion of about 1,000 officers and men with additional supporting personnel totalling about 100, or alternatively a smaller group composed of trained tradesmen, engineer and medical teams, army service corps drivers, etc. Such a group would be valuable in assisting in the rehabilitation and reconstruction necessary in Korea. The Supreme Commander and the Chiefs of Staff in Washington had indicated that either form of Canadian participation would be welcome.

The alternatives for the remainder of the Force were:

(a) to keep it or a large part of it in Canada;

It was considered that this would give rise to serious accommodation problems and disciplinary difficulties. There were no facilities available in Canada to train the force as a unit. Even to keep them here at a number of different camps would involve large expenditures. The Force had been raised primarily for service outside the country and it was considered essential to the good morale of the Force that it leave Canada to complete its training.

(b) to have the remainder or a considerable part of it go to Europe as part of the integrated force as soon as this is organized and if Parliament had given its approval.

In all probability the United States would not be ready to send any additional troops to Europe until March.

(c) to have the remainder complete its unit training in the United States.

In addition to being cheaper than keeping the Force in Canada, this would provide a valuable opportunity for unit training in a suitable area with U.S. troops.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Oct. 24, 1950 — Cab. Doc. 241-50)

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that the appropriate military authorities of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization might indicate that, from a military point of view it would be undesirable to have as small a national component as was proposed as part of the integrated force.

6. Mr. Claxton said that the suggested contribution for Canada for forces in being in Europe by 1954 drawn up by the Standing Group was one-third of a division and seven and one-half fighter squadrons.

7. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, agreed:

(a) that it be indicated at the meetings of the Defence Deputies, the Military Committee and the Defence Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Washington that Canada in the present circumstances would be prepared to send either a group of specialists composed of army engineers and medical teams and other suitable components to assist in the reconstruction and rehabilitation of Korea or an infantry battalion and supporting elements (with preference for the former);

(b) that the Minister of National Defence seek the best available camp in the United States where the remainder of the Special Force might complete its unit training in cooperation with the armed forces of the United States;

(c) that it be indicated that, on completion of this training and if it appeared desirable at the time, the Canadian Government would be prepared to request the approval of Parliament for participation of a considerable part of the Force in the integrated force for Western Europe;

(d) that the Minister of National Defence make an announcement regarding participation in Korea and the arrangements for further training of the remainder of the Force when suitable arrangements had been completed.

KOREA; DISPOSITION OF CANADIAN ARMY SPECIAL FORCE

5. The Minister of Resources and Development, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 25th, 1950, and to recent press reports on anticipated movements of the Canadian Army Special Force, enquired whether it was proposed to reconsider the disposition to be made of these troops in view of recent developments in the Korean conflict.

6. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, as Acting Prime Minister, said it was not intended, at the moment, to alter the previous decision that one battalion proceed to Korea and the remainder of the Force continue training at Fort Lewis, Washington, U.S.A. If the situation deteriorated any further in Korea, however, it was quite possible that the whole of the Special Force might have to be despatched to the theatre of conflict. No firm indication had yet been given by the U.N. Supreme Commander in Korea that the Canadian Force could be usefully employed as a complete unit in Korea at this time.

7. The Minister of Fisheries stressed the desirability of the United Nations adopting some form of armistice policy with respect to Korea. It seemed clear, particularly in view of Communist China's intervention in the Korean conflict, that the fighting would not cease if and when the North Koreans were pushed back to the Yalu River. Furthermore, if U.N. troops carried the fight right up to the Manchuria-Korea border, regrettable international incidents might and probably would result. In the circumstances, the wise course would seem to be to agree now on a hypothetical armistice line somewhere short of the Manchurian border, beyond which no fighting would take place.

8. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the remarks of the Acting Prime Minister and the Minister of Fisheries on the disposition of the Canadian Army Special Force and on recent developments in the Korean situation.

Attached are copies of telegrams 1274 and 1275 of November 18 from the C[ommonwealth] R[elations] O[ffice] to Earnscliffe which Sir Alexander Clutterbuck left with me on November 20. Telegram 1274 asks whether the Canadian forces are to be associated with other Commonwealth land forces in Korea, and if so whether any changes in the arrangements agreed between the United Kingdom, Australia, and New Zealand are necessary. An enquiry has been sent to the Chiefs of Staff for advice as to how the telegram should be answered.

Telegram 1275 gives the text of instructions to General Robertson, Commander of BCOF.

COMMONWEALTH FORCES IN KOREA

Prime Minister of Australia has now telegraphed to Prime Minister and to Prime Minister of New Zealand for approval of United Kingdom and New Zealand Governments draft directive to General Robertson giving effect to principles of non-operational control and administration of force agreed between United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand Governments. Directive is contained in my immediately following telegram. This has been accepted by United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff.

2. Mr. Menzies asks for present United Kingdom views on question of making public and communicating to United States arrangements now agreed for Commonwealth force. Mr. Menzies points out that it would in any case seem necessary to bring directive to notice of General MacArthur.

3. We are anxious to complete arrangements for Commonwealth force and to make public announcement as soon as possible. United Kingdom 29th Infantry Brigade is already in Korea and New Zealand regiment is expected to arrive about mid December so that it will not be possible to keep our arrangements private for very much longer.

4. We have heard nothing from Canadian Government since we gave them the aide mémoire enclosed in my despatch under reference but War Office have heard from Canadian military representative in London

(a) that only one battalion will now be sent to Korea and

(b) that Canadians wish this battalion to be linked with the other Commonwealth land forces. We assume that Canadian Government will be replying accordingly to our aide mémoire in due course but I should be glad if you would confirm with them now that our understanding is correct. If so please ask them

(a) whether and in what specific ways they think the arrangements agreed between United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand for non-operational control and administration would need modification and

(b) whether our suggested compromise on the title of the force would be acceptable to them. Please obtain answers on these points as a matter of urgency since we must answer Australian Prime Minister's enquiry in paragraph 2 above as soon as possible. Meanwhile Prime Minister has replied to Mr. Menzies

(a) agreeing to directive so far as United Kingdom is concerned but

(b) pointing out that Canadian concurrence in directive will also be required when as now seems probable Canadian contingent is linked with Australian, New Zealand and United Kingdom contingents and

(c) that pending clarification of Canadian attitude it seems inadvisable to communicate directive to General MacArthur although there would be no objection to letting him — and also United States authorities in Washington — know informally position reached as between Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom.

5. In speaking to Canadian authorities you will no doubt inform them of developments in relation to Indian Ambulance Unit reported in my telegram No. 1222.

6. Whatever Canadian reply is made we should of course let Canadian Government know in advance of any public announcement i.e. even if this related to a United Kingdom/Australian/New Zealand/Indian force.

TELEGRAM 1275 [London], November 18, 1950

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Repeat Delhi No. 2693. My immediately preceding telegram. Following is proposed directive to General Robertson, Begins:

"Introduction

His Majesty's Governments in the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand, have agreed that, in accordance with the principles and procedure established in connection with the British Commonwealth Occupation Force in Japan, responsibility for non-operational control and the general administration of the United Kingdom, Australian and New Zealand army and air forces which have been or may be made available to the United Nations for operation in Korea should rest with the Australian Defence machinery together with the accredited representatives in Australia of the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff and the New Zealand Chiefs of Staff.

2. This directive which defines your responsibilities as Commander in Chief, British Commonwealth Occupation Force, in relation to such forces, is issued to you by the Australian Government in accordance with the assignment of responsibility referred to in Paragraph 1 above.

3. This directive is additional to, and where it conflicts with it, supersedes your existing directive as Commander in Chief, British Commonwealth Occupation Force dated 21st April, 1949.

Appointment

4. You are appointed the representative of the Australian Chiefs of Staff to the Commander in Chief of U.N. forces operating in Korea in respect of non-operational control and general administration of the forces set out in paragraph 1 above.

Command and Control

5. (a) The operational control of the forces referred to in paragraph 1 above, will be exercised by U.N. Unified Command.

(b) non-operational control and administration of the forces referred to in paragraph 1 above will be your responsibility as Commander in Chief British Commonwealth Occupation Force.

6. In relation to non-operational control and administration of the Commonwealth forces concerned policy directions to you will be ? imbued ? from the Australian Chiefs of Staff Committee.

7. You will be the representative of and responsible to each Commonwealth Service Headquarters concerned for administrative matters which concern them alone and you will communicate direct with them in relation thereto. This does not prejudice the right of Commanders of national components to communicate direct with their own Governments in accordance with the directives they have received from them.

Base Organization

8. To maintain the British Commonwealth Forces in Korea a British Commonwealth advanced base is to be established in Korea with an element in Japan. This base is to be stocked from the main base in Singapore ?for? existing British Commonwealth Occupation Force Base in Japan and other British Commonwealth sources as may be decided from time to time.

9. The existing British Commonwealth Occupation Force Base in Japan will be responsible for maintaining such elements of the advanced base as may be located in Japan in all respects except for ordnance equipment and stores.

Safeguarding Interests of British Commonwealth Forces

10. As the representative in Japan of the Australian and New Zealand Chiefs of Staff and the United Kingdom Service Departments concerned you are to interest yourself in the operational tasks allotted to the United Kingdom, Australian and New Zealand forces and for this purpose you are to maintain close contact with the Commander of the British Commonwealth Force in the field. If the Commander of the British Commonwealth force in the field in Korea makes representation to you in regard to the operational employment of his force you are to represent the case to the Commander in Chief of the U.N. Forces in Korea and report to the Australian Chiefs of Staff Committee.

Financial Responsibilities

11. Your financial responsibilities in relation to the employment of the British Commonwealth Force in Korea will be communicated to you at a later date.

Reports

12. You will be responsible to the Australian and New Zealand Chiefs of Staff Committees for

(a) the despatch of authoritative periodical reports on the battle situation with such comments as you deem necessary.

(b) the despatch of periodical appreciations of the general situation as seen by the Commander in Chief U.N. Forces in Korea.

(c) keeping them informed of future plans including expected reinforcements and the forecast dates of their deployment in the theatre.

(d) the despatch of information concerning the tactics and technical equipment employed by the enemy. You should also report on Allied tactics and weapons effectiveness.

13. You will be responsible for providing the Commander in Chief U.N. Forces in Korea with any detailed information he may require concerning British Commonwealth Forces placed at his disposal." Ends.

II. STATUS OF CANADIAN ARMY FORCES IN KOREA

34. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the Canadian military authorities had made tentative arrangements to have the 2nd Battalion, Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, brigaded with the British 29th Brigade in Korea and to have them maintained through this brigade. It was understood that these arrangements would be satisfactory to the unified command. Draft instructions to General Robertson were submitted, providing him, as the Commander-in-Chief, British Commonwealth Occupation Force in Japan, with responsibility for non-operational control and the general administration of the Canadian Armed Forces.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs, Nov. 30, 1950 — Cab. Doc. D263)†

Mr. Heeney said that with certain minor modifications, these instructions provided for similar arrangements to those in force for the United Kingdom, Australian and New Zealand forces in Korea.

35. The Chief of the General Staff said that when the question of maintaining the Canadian battalion came up, it had been discussed with the War Office and it had been suggested that General Robertson, who had excellent facilities at his disposal, be given responsibility for base administration. The U.N. Command would of course have full jurisdiction regarding the operational role of the force. As there were not now, and would not be for some time, enough troops to form a Commonwealth Division, the question of nomenclature did not arise at present.

Brigadier Fleury, Canadian Military Liaison Officer in Tokyo, had recently had satisfactory discussions concerning the arrangements for the administration of the Canadian Armed Force with General Robertson, and it appeared that the only change of substance in the directive needed to meet the Canadian position was to have General Robertson deal with the Canadian Military Liaison Officer in Tokyo rather than the Canadian Chiefs of Staff.

36. The Committee, after further discussion:

(a) agreed that the 2nd Battalion, Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, be maintained from the British Commonwealth Occupation Force in Japan;

(b) approved the draft instructions to General Robertson, Commander-in-Chief, British Commonwealth Occupation Force in Japan, as submitted;

(c) agreed that the Unified Command and the U.K. Government be notified of the above arrangements.

EMPLOYMENT OF 2ND BATTALION, PRINCESS PATRICIA'S CANADIAN LIGHT INFANTRY

1. The Minister of National Defence reported that the 2nd Battalion, Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, was due to arrive in Japan within a matter of hours. The intention was that they should proceed from there to Korea to be stationed at an airfield not at present in use about fifteen miles from Pusan. The military situation in Korea was still very grave, but it now appeared that an orderly retreat would be possible and it was thought that a bridgehead would be established at Inchon. It was difficult to assess what the future would hold or even what the present intentions of the Unified Command were. However, it appeared that there would be an attempt to hold as strong a line as possible in order to protect possible evacuation.

The use that the advance party already in Korea and the 2nd Battalion, P.P.C.L.I. might be put to would of course depend on how the military situation developed. At present it seemed that one possibility would be to provide a guard for North Korean prisoners in the Pusan area. However, it was possible that a situation might develop which would cause them to actively engage in operations. Forty-two percent of the force were veterans and their present state of training compared favourably with that of many of the troops of other nations already in Korea. They would land equipped with their hand weapons and the remainder of their weapons would follow on another ship in a number of days. The instructions of the Canadian Commander, which had been communicated to General MacArthur, made it clear that he was not to engage in operations except in self-defence until satisfied that the battalion was battleworthy and its training completed.

Brigadier Fleury, the Canadian Military Representative at Tokyo who was fully aware of the desirability of keeping Canadian troops out of action until battleworthy, planned to board the ship at Yokahama and accompany the battalion to Korea.

It was for consideration whether it would be desirable to communicate with the U.S. authorities more formally, the Canadian government's concern that Canadian troops be not employed in active operations in Korea until fully battleworthy. It was felt that, with the U.N. troops pressed and fighting for their lives, to adopt such a course might cause understandable resentment.

2. The Minister of Justice pointed out that, except in the event of a disaster, there was the smallest likelihood that the battalion would be employed in operations until it was equipped with its full scale of weapons and adequately trained. If a crisis did occur, then Canadians would have no alternative but to defend themselves against the enemy.

3. The Minister of Agriculture thought that it would be very difficult to proscribe to the U.N. Military Command the conditions which could govern the employment of Canadian troops in Korea.

4. Mr. Claxton said that, if the situation permitted the 2nd Battalion to complete its training, a decision had to be made then concerning the force they would be associated with in operations. The United Kingdom had originally intended to withdraw the 27th Brigade from Korea and return it to Hong Kong as soon as possible but the information now was that the Brigade would be left in Korea until the situation became more stabilized. This would mean that the 27th and 29th Brigades together with other Commonwealth troops could form a division of a reasonable size which it had been suggested should be called the 1st (Commonwealth) Division, United Nations Forces. The question arose as to whether the Canadian battalion should be included in such a division.

5. The Prime Minister suggested that the Canadian position should be that the government would be prepared to approve such a course if the Unified Command considered that Canadian troops could be most effectively used in conjunction with other Commonwealth units. It seemed reasonable that they should fight beside those equipped with the same type of weapons as they were.

6. The Cabinet, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that no further communication be made to the U.S. authorities concerning the disposition of Canadian troops bound for Korea; and,

(b) that, if the Unified Command considered it desirable, the Canadian Armed Force in Korea participate, for the purpose of operations, with other Commonwealth troops in a formation to be known as the 1st (Commonwealth) Division, United Nations Forces.

95. DEA/50069-B-40

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au haut-commissaire du Royaume-Uni

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner of United Kingdom

TOP SECRET Ottawa, December 8, 1950

Dear Sir Alexander [Clutterbuck],

I refer to the enquiries you raised with me on November 19 concerning the plans for the Canadian Army force in Korea.

I wish to confirm the understanding of the War Office that only one combat unit, the 2nd Battalion, Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, is at present under orders to proceed to Korea and that the Canadian authorities wish to have this unit linked with other land forces from Commonwealth countries. I wish also to confirm in principle the agreement reached between the Canadian military authorities and the War Office that the 2nd PPCLI should be brigaded with the 29th Brigade and maintained under arrangements for the maintenance of the Brigade.

Detailed arrangements for the maintenance of the Battalion are at present under discussion between the Commander-in-Chief, British Commonwealth Occupation Force, and the Canadian Military Liaison Officer in Japan. These discussions relate only to non-operational control and administration. It will be satisfactory to the Canadian authorities to have these arrangements confirmed at Service levels.

It will be appreciated that operational control of the 2nd Battalion PPCLI remains the responsibility of the Unified Command. At the same time, it is understood that the Unified Command is in complete agreement with the proposal to brigade the 2nd Battalion PPCLI with the 29th British Brigade. A copy of our instructions to the Commanding Officer, 2nd Battalion PPCLI, has been sent to the Unified Command. In these instructions it is stated:

"In the event that operations are in progress when you arrive in Korea you are not to engage in such operations, except in self-defence, until you have completed the training of your command and are satisfied that your unit is fit for operations."

With regard to the proposed title for a Division of ground forces from Commonwealth countries, should a division ultimately be formed, the proposed title "First (Commonwealth) Division, United Nations Forces", would be acceptable to the Canadian Government.

You were kind enough to give me a copy of the draft directive to General Robertson, Commander in Chief, British Commonwealth Occupation Force in Japan, and to ask whether any changes would be necessary if Canadian forces were to be associated with the land forces from other Commonwealth countries. It is suggested that certain changes of a minor nature will be required in the directive.

In the first place the directive includes in its scope Army and Air Forces. Canada has contributed No. 426 Squadron, RCAF, to the United Nations Forces, but this squadron is serving under the operational control of the United States Military Air Transport Service, administrative control of the squadron remaining with the RCAF. For this reason, it would be impracticable, in so far as Canada is concerned, to include air forces under the same non-operational control and administrative arrangements as army forces.

In the second place, the directive states that the responsibility for non-operational control and general administration rests with the Australian Defence machinery, together with the accredited representatives in Australia of the United Kingdom and New Zealand Chiefs of Staff. Since the Canadian Chiefs of Staff have no representative in Australia, it is suggested that the instructions should be modified to provide that responsibility in so far as Canada is concerned rests with the Commander-in-Chief, British Commonwealth Occupation Force, together with the Canadian Military Liaison Officer in Japan.

The following changes in the draft instructions are, therefore, proposed:

Paragraph 1, 1st line: after "His Majesty's Governments in the United Kingdom" insert "Canada".

Same paragraph, 7th line: After "New Zealand Army and Air Forces" insert "and Canadian Army Forces".

Same paragraph: delete last part of paragraph beginning "in Australia of the United Kingdom Chiefs . . . " and insert instead "of the Chiefs of Staff of the participating Commonwealth countries. The Canadian Military Liaison Officer in Tokyo has been designated as the accredited representative of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff in so far as non-operational control and general administration of the Canadian Army Forces are concerned."

Paragraph 10, 2nd line: after "and the United Kingdom" insert "and Canadian".

Same paragraph, 5th line: after "New Zealand forces" insert "and Canadian Army Forces".

Paragraph 12, 1st line: before or after "Australian" insert "Canadian".

I enclose a copy of the instructions with the proposed amendments inserted.†

I need scarcely add that Canadian troops are happy with the prospect of serving with their gallant comrades from other Commonwealth countries in the common United Nations cause.

Yours sincerely,
[A.D.P. HEENEY]

Le haut-commissaire du Royaume-Uni au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

High Commissioner of United Kingdom to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Dear Mr. Heeney,

I have now received, for communication to the Canadian Government, the views of the United Kingdom Government on your letter of 8th December regarding the plans for the Canadian Army Force in Korea.

The United Kingdom Government warmly welcome the decision of the Canadian Government to associate their army force in Korea with the forces now serving there from other Commonwealth countries.

As regards the Directive to General Robertson, they are in full agreement with the amendments proposed by the Canadian authorities. The United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff have, however, pointed out that in order to define clearly the location of the accredited representatives of both the United Kingdom and New Zealand Chiefs of Staff, an additional sentence will now be required at the end of paragraph 1 of the directive. They propose, therefore, that there should be inserted after the words "should rest with the Australian defence machinery" the following passage:

"together with the accredited representatives of the Chiefs of Staff of all the participating Commonwealth countries. The accredited representatives of the United Kingdom and New Zealand Chiefs of Staff are located in Australia. The Canadian Military Liaison Officer at Tokyo has been designated as the accredited representative of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff in so far as non-operational control and general administration of the Canadian Army Force are concerned."

I assume that this further amendment will meet with the approval of the Canadian Government.

In so far as the title of the Commonwealth land forces in Korea is concerned, I have been asked to add that it is not at present intended that a division of Commonwealth land forces should be formed. Consequently, there is no need for the moment to put the proposed title into effect. The other Commonwealth Governments concerned have, however, been informed of the suggested title in the event of a division being formed later, and their approval of it is being sought.

For the present it is the view of the United Kingdom Government that in the circumstances described above, no public announcement about the association of all the Commonwealth forces in Korea is called for. The United Kingdom Government would, however, be happy at a suitable time to consider, in conjunction with the Canadian and the other Commonwealth Governments concerned, the precise terms of an announcement if developments should make one desirable.

Yours sincerely,

ALEC CLUTTERBUCK

Following is an extract from a speech delivered by the Honourable L.B. Pearson before the Canadian Club, Victoria, on August 21, Begins:[51]

"I think it would be useful if the United Nations were to establish a small commission to work out with representatives of the Republic of Korea, plans for a government of a free and united Korea, once the fighting has ceased in that unhappy land. I am afraid that more will be required in present circumstances than a return to the status quo. To determine what more should be required is, I think, primarily the responsibility and, indeed, the privilege of Asian members of the United Nations. For that purpose, if a commission of the kind I have suggested were formed, I think it would be wise to have the majority of the commission from Asia. We get, these days, a lot of good advice from Asian leaders on the handling of Asian problems. This would be a good occasion to offer them responsibility for translating this advice into action." Ends.

Reference your telegram No. 437 of August 22nd.†

Copies of extract from your statement have been given to United Kingdom, United States, Pakistan, Indian, Australian and New Zealand delegation. In writing Sir Benegal Rau, I said that I would be glad to receive any comment he might care to make, and he sent me a message immediately that he would be glad to see me. When I called this morning, he said that he had felt it essential that long term aims of the United Nations in Korea should be defined, and he added that he thought such a course of action might have considerable effect on the North Koreans. The problem is to get a committee or commission which would be acceptable to the United States and which would not be vetoed by the U.S.S.R. He had suggested the six non-permanent members of the Council as a logical group and added that choice of this committee would also have avoided question of Chinese representation.

2. The United States and United Kingdom delegations had told him that they thought proposals should await a more favourable military situation in Korea and had indicated that in the meantime, if a resolution were put and came to a vote, they would abstain. The French, Yugoslav, Ecuadorian, Egyptian members of Council were favourable, although Chauvel[52] subsequently suggested delay. Cuban had no instructions. Malik had made it clear he did not like the proposed committee, but had not indicated whether he would exercise the veto. Rau said that it was because of these circumstances that he had not pressed his proposal.

3. I said that when Assembly met, consideration might be given to forming an Assembly commission on this subject, and that your proposal might then be considered. Rau thought the idea was an admirable one, and his only misgiving was about the position of China. He seemed to think that it would be embarrassing to set up a commission to make long term proposals for Korea without including China unless there were some obvious reason, such as his formula for a Security Council committee, for omitting the Chinese representative. He realized, of course, that in present circumstances it would be impossible to include a Chinese representative of any kind.

Jean Michel Henri Chauvel, Permanent Delegate of France to United Nations.

4. When the conversation became general, Rau said that the Indian Government had, up to the present at least, had considerable influence with the new Government in China, and they had been urging the Chinese Communists to avoid provocative action of any kind in relation either to Korea or Formosa. He thought this advice had had some effect, but it would be increasingly difficult to restrain the Chinese. They were inclined to suspect that the United States had long term designs on Formosa, and the present public debate on this subject in this country did little to quiet their fears. He thought, however, that if the Chinese Communists could be reasonably sure that they would within a reasonable time get Formosa without challenging the United States, they would certainly hold their hand.

Following for Reid, Begins: As you requested, we have tried our hand at a draft resolution proposing the establishment of a new Commission on Korea, in line with the suggestion contained in the Minister's statement in Victoria. The text of the draft is given in my immediately following teletype.

2. You will notice that in this draft I have used your simplified form of resolution, suppressing all WHEREASES and other irrelevant words. Other delegations are, however, so used to the existing form that it is sometimes difficult to get them to realize that a document that does not follow the usual pattern is intended to be a resolution.

3. No attempt has been made in this draft resolution to resolve the relationship between the existing United Nations temporary Commission on Korea and the new Commission which it is proposed to set up. I am not quite sure what you have in mind in this regard. Four of the States which are nominated in the draft for membership in the new Commission are already members of the old one, and there is also some overlapping in terms of reference. I presume, therefore, that we would have to clear this point up at an early stage in the drafting.

4. The wording of paragraphs 2 and 3 of the resolution itself (as distinct from the preamble) is purposely general and somewhat vague. I think Rau feels that if it were possible to give some assurance to the people of North Korea that, when the Communists have been dispossessed, the territory would not be immediately and without reservation turned over to Syngman Rhee and his colleagues, there might be greater possibility of a new regime being accepted in the North. In wording this paragraph, therefore, I have had it in mind that the proposed Commission might conceivably recommend that some group of authorities in the North who would take over from the defeated Communists would then negotiate with Syngman Rhee for the establishment of a united Korea on some new basis. Ends.

Following for Reid, Begins: With reference to my immediately preceding teletype, the following is text of draft resolution for the purpose of establishing a United Nations Commission for a Korean settlement. Text begins:

PREAMBLE

1. The General Assembly, in its resolutions of 14th November 1947, 12th December 1948, and 21st October 1949, expressed its desire that Korea should be united and independent under institutions of Government freely chosen by the Korean people.

2. The General Assembly has, accordingly, maintained in Korea since January 1948, a United Nations Commission for the purpose of facilitating and expediting the establishment by the Korean people of a Government of their own choosing.

3. The work of this Commission was impeded by the refusal of the authorities in North Korea to cooperate with the Commission or to admit it to the territory under their control.

4. The Commission, nevertheless, observed the establishment by free elections, in that part of Korea which it was permitted to enter, of a National Assembly and of a Government chosen by that Assembly. The General Assembly, on 12th December, 1948, declared that this Government (the Government of the Republic of Korea) was based on elections which were a valid expression of the free will of the electorate of that part of Korea which the Commission was able to observe.

5. The United Nations Commission on Korea has reported that on 25th June, 1950, the territory under the control of the Government of the Republic of Korea was invaded by armed forces organized north of the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea.

6. The Security Council of the United Nations, in a resolution of 25th June, 1950, called upon the authorities in North Korea to cease hostilities forthwith and to withdraw their armed forces to the thirty-eighth parallel. When this resolution was disregarded by the authorities in North Korea, the Security Council, on 27th June, 1950, recommended that the members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as might be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area.

7. The establishment of a free and united Korea has been delayed and complicated by this act of armed aggression against the Government of the Republic of Korea by the authorities in North Korea.

The General Assembly therefore resolves:

(1) To establish a Commission composed of representatives of Australia, India, the Philippines, Sweden, and Turkey, to be known as the United Nations Commission for a Korean settlement.

(2) To instruct the United Nations Commission for a Korean settlement to report to the General Assembly on the methods which are best suited for the establishment of a free and independent Government for a united Korea which shall correspond with the freely expressed wishes of the Korean people, and also on the methods by which the General Assembly and other organs of the United Nations may assist the Korean people in achieving these objects.

(3) To instruct the United Nations Commission for a Korean settlement to recommend to the Assembly such temporary measures as it considers necessary for the maintenance of peace and order throughout Korea until such responsibility can be accepted by the independent Government of a united Korea.

(4) To authorize the United Nations Commission for a Korean settlement to establish its own rules of procedure, and to consult whatever individuals and authorities it may regards as appropriate. Text ends. Ends.

During his call, Rusk said that military resistance of North Korean Communists seemed to be collapsing very quickly and that political decisions about post-war situation in Korea might have to be taken sooner than anyone had originally expected.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following is draft resolution on Korea prepared by United Kingdom Government and handed to us today. Text Begins:

The General Assembly

HAVING REGARD to its resolutions of 14th November 1947 of 12th December 1948 and of 21st October 1949;

HAVING taken note of the report of the United Nations Commission on Korea;

MINDFUL of the fact that the objectives set forth in the resolutions referred to have not been fully accomplished and in particular that the unification of Korea has not yet been achieved, and that an attempt has been made by an armed attack from North Korea to extinguish by force the Government of the Republic of Korea;

RECALLING its declaration of 12th December 1948 that there has been established a lawful Government (the Government of the Republic of Korea) having effective control and jurisdiction over that part of Korea where the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea was able to observe and consult and in which the great majority of the people of Korea reside; that this Government is based on elections which were a valid expression of free will of the electorate of that part of Korea and which were observed by the Temporary Commission; and that this is the only such Government in Korea;

HAVING IN MIND that United Nations armed forces are at present operating in Korea in accordance with the recommendations of the Security Council of 27th June 1950, subsequent to its resolution of 25th June 1950, that members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area;

RECALLING that the essential objective of the resolutions of the General Assembly referred to was the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic Government of Korea;

RECOMMENDS (a) That all necessary steps be taken to ensure conditions of enduring peace throughout the whole of Korea;

(b) That elections be held and other constituent acts be taken under the auspices of the United Nations to complete the establishment of a unified, independent, and democratic Government of all Korea,

(c) That any United Nations forces entering North Korea do not remain otherwise than so far as necessary for achieving the objectives specified at (a) and (b) above;

RESOLVES THAT

(a) A Commission consisting of _____ to be known as the United Nations Unification and Recovery Commission in Korea be established to (I) assume the functions hitherto exercised by the present United Nations Commission in Korea; (II) Represent the United Nations in bringing about the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic Government of all Korea; (III) Organize and supervise United Nations activities directed toward the rehabilitation and recovery of Korea, consulting as may be appropriate in all these tasks with the Government of the Republic of Korea; the United Nations Unification and Recovery Commission should proceed to Korea and begin to carry out its functions as soon as possible;

(b) Pending the arrival of the United Nations Unification and Recovery Commission in Korea, Governments represented on the Commission should form an Interim Committee composed of their Permanent Representatives at the seat of the United Nations to consult with and advise the United Nations Unified Command in the light of the above recommendations.

The General Assembly Furthermore,

MINDFUL of the fact that at the end of the present hostilities the task of rehabilitating the Korean economy will be of great magnitude;

RECOMMENDS that the United Nations Unification and Recovery Commission in Korea should consult with the Economic and Social Council in preparing a programme of economic and technical assistance. Text ends.

KOREAN SETTLEMENT

Following from Reid, Begins: The present course of military operations in Korea makes an early statement of United Nations objectives in Korea important for the following reasons:

(a) General MacArthur may soon close his trap on a substantial number of the North Korean forces that were investing the Pusan beachhead and it may then be militarily urgent to call for the surrender of these forces, not unconditionally, but on certain terms.

(b) Now that the United Nations forces have gone over from the defensive to the offensive, a call for a cease fire on terms that the United Nations forces could soon impose anyway would demonstrate to the Koreans and world opinion the compassionate concern of the United Nations to avoid any more bloodshed and material destruction than necessary. The Prime Minister as you know attaches great importance to this.

(c) The question of crossing the 38th parallel may arise in a military context soon and it would be desirable to have some United Nations decision on this question in advance of this contingency.

2. Present United Nations objectives in Korea are of two types: immediate and long run.

(a) Immediate Objectives

(i) Cessation of hostilities and withdrawal of North Korean armed forces to the 38th parallel (Security Council Resolution of June 25).

(ii) Restoration of international peace and security in the Korean area (Security Council Resolution of June 27).

(b) Long Run Objectives

Achievement of Korean independence and unity by the procedures outlined in the General Assembly resolutions of 14 November, 1947, 12 December, 1948 and 21 October, 1949.

3. The immediate objectives of the United Nations in Korea, as defined in the Security Council resolutions of June 25 and June 27, must be accomplished if the purpose of the United Nations in intervening to suppress the North Korean aggression is to be realized.

(a) It must be made clear that overt aggression will not be tolerated. The exemplary speed with which the United States reacted, and the beating that the North Korean forces are now getting will probably have demonstrated that small wars of aggression around the periphery of the Soviet Union do not pay.

(b) The restoration of international peace and security in the Korean area will probably be largely accomplished by the defeat of the North Koreans. So many North Koreans have been killed, so many captured and so much equipment destroyed that North Koreans are not likely to attack again soon regardless of how hard they may be pushed from behind. So far as the restoration of international peace and security in the Far East is concerned, this cannot be expected to grow from a military victory by United Nations in Korea. That victory will certainly create a new attitude of respect on the part of the Soviet Union and Communist China. However, the foundation of permanent peace is still lacking and must be sought in other areas as well as in Korea.

4. There would be certain dangers in proposing that the United Nations obligate itself at this time to achieve its long run objectives in Korea by military means.

(a) It is doubtful if such a proposal would get the broad support which has been given to the June 25 and June 27 Security Council resolutions.

(b) The Soviet Union might consider itself compelled for prestige and strategic reasons to re-occupy North Korea and could justify such intervention on legal grounds in the absence of a Japanese peace treaty determining the status of Korea.

(c) The Chinese Communists might feel compelled to intervene because of the fraternal association of Korean and Chinese Communist leaders at Yenan for nearly ten years and in repayment for assistance given them by Korean forces in Manchuria.

(d) Operations in North Korea would place United Nations forces face to face with the Russians and Chinese Communists on the North Korean borders and create another area in which military incidents could occur.

(e) If the Russians re-occupy North Korea and the United Nations was committed to crossing the 38th parallel and occupying North Korea, the Western powers would be placed in the position where they would either have to launch a general war against the Russians in North Korea, when in fact their strategic interests in a general war would be to evacuate their forces from the peninsula as quickly as possible, or else admit their unwillingness to carry out a General Assembly resolution in the face of Soviet opposition.

5. There would also be obvious disadvantages if the United Nations forces stopped at the 38th parallel, particularly if the North Koreans maintained a belligerent attitude.

(a) Many Koreans hope that one good result of this struggle will be the unification of Korea.

(b) The Government of the Republic of Korea is anxious to push forward and unify the peninsula by military means and there will be difficulty restraining them and the public opinion they control.

(c) Redivision of the country at the 38th parallel would re-create all the old military, political and economic problems that plagued the Republic of Korea, and might make many Americans feel that their losses in Korea had been in vain.

(d) The Soviet Union would probably intervene quietly in North Korea to maintain the Communists in power and suppress any groups wishing to join the South in a unified democratic government.

6. On the basis of the discussion above and the reports which you have sent us, we make the following suggestions:

(a) The need for a definition of United Nations objectives in Korea has now become so urgent that it would not be practical to follow the more leisurely procedure of establishing a predominantly Asian sub-committee of the political committee to draft a report and resolution for the political committee.

(b) Instead, an effort should be made to have the General Assembly pass a resolution as quickly as possible restating its short-run and long-run objectives for Korea as defined in paragraph 2 above, plus a statement of United Nations assistance in relief and reconstruction.

(i) Such a resolution would leave it open to the United Nations to take military action north of the 38th parallel if the North Koreans refused to sign an agreement pledging cessation of hostilities.

(ii) Adoption of a fairly flexible position at this stage would leave the United Nations without a commitment if the Russians or Chinese entered North Korea and would leave the way open for informal discussions with the Russians and Chinese communists concerning a settlement. These discussions might be begun in New York with Mr. Vishinsky.

(iii) The possibility that North Korean prisoners would be held for employment in South Korea on reconstruction projects for a time at least might have an influence on North Korean attitudes.

(iv) The United Nations would offer relief and reconstruction assistance to North Korea if it accepted the procedures of the earlier United Nations General Assembly Resolutions for the unification of Korea. Such an offer would probably have a strong appeal to North Koreans as they can hardly expect extensive Soviet assistance for this purpose. Ends.

Following for Reid, Begins: Your teletype No. 28. Your comments on the Korean settlement contained in your telegram under reference are very helpful. The situation here is moving fast as a result of victories in Korea and the danger that military events may outrun political decisions becomes more pressing. In these circumstances, I feel that my statement in plenary session, which I shall make this afternoon, should include a passage on Korea dealing with some of the policy questions arising out of the military victories, and, to some extent, foreshadowing the kind of action contemplated in the United Kingdom resolution sent to you in my telegram No. 24 of September 25th. My immediately following telegram† contains the text of the relevant passage in my speech, although this is still subject to change.[53]

2. Meanwhile, I should welcome your comments on the United Kingdom resolution, particularly on (a) the formula contained in recommendation (c) regarding United Nations forces crossing the 38th parallel and (b) the arrangements contemplated for the relationship of the proposed United Nations unification and recovery commission to the task of rehabilitation in Korea. This part of the resolution dealing with rehabilitation and recovery arrangements may not have been very fully thought out and may require amendment. Ends.

KOREA

Following from Reid, Begins: Your teletype No. 32 of September 27.

I discussed with Norman Robertson and Menzies yesterday afternoon the dangers implicit in the assumption that the objectives of United Nations military action in Korea should now be changed from repelling aggression to achieving the unification of Korea. We consider that the broad military and strategic implications and risks of this proposed change in objectives should be weighed very carefully by the Governments that will have to assume the burden of military responsibility. The United Nations and the Western powers have achieved a signal military success in Korea on a narrow margin. Should United Nations forces now cross the 38th parallel and undertake to occupy North Korea they face at best the prospect of maintaining large occupation forces on the Chinese and Soviet borders, and there would be a good deal of pressure to have our Special Force included in these occupation forces. Moreover occupation of North Korea would involve a continuing risk of a clash with the Russians in North Korea which even if it were localized might well result in a setback that would undo the prestige won by our victory in South Korea. Of course if a general war broke out, I assume that United Nations forces would be evacuated from Korea. Have you had an opportunity to discuss this military aspect of the problem with Acheson or Bevin personally?

2. We think that the natural desire of most Koreans to see their country united should be weighed against the continued necessity for the Western powers to exercise prudence in circumstances that might lead to an armed clash with the Soviet Union. We consider that such a circumstance would arise in connection with the proposal to go beyond the terms of the Security Council Resolutions of June 25 and June 27 by crossing the 38th parallel to secure the unification of Korea by military means.

3. We think that a clear distinction should be made between fulfilment of the Security Council Resolutions and fulfilment of the General Assembly resolutions. It is essential to the prestige of the United Nations that the objectives of the Security Council resolutions should be fulfilled. The United Nations has not, however, considered during the past three years that its long-run objectives for the unification of Korea as set out in the General Assembly resolutions required [them] to be imposed by military force. It sought to achieve these objectives by peaceful means only. We think that this distinction could and should be maintained now.

4. I am sending in my immediately following telegram† a hastily prepared rough redraft of the United Kingdom draft resolution on Korea contained in your teletype No. 24 of September 24. Essentially this limits the United Nations to fulfilment of the Security Council resolutions. The reference to the restoration of international peace and security in the Korea area would permit the United Nations Commander to order punitive action against North Korea if the latter continued aggressive action against South Korea. Provided they desisted from aggressive action — and perhaps gave an undertaking to that effect — the North Koreans would be free to choose to stew in their own bombed-out misery or accept United Nations relief and reconstruction assistance if they comply with the procedures laid down by the General Assembly for the unification of Korea.

5. The preamble of our redraft is identical with the preamble of the U.K. draft.

6. I do not think that discussion of this draft resolution with United States and United Kingdom delegations would be inconsistent with the principles for a Korean settlement which you enunciated in your speech yesterday. Ends.

UNITED NATIONS ASSEMBLY; RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN KOREA

1. The Prime Minister reported that the First (Political) Committee of the U.N. General Assembly had now before it two proposals for settlement of the Korean situation. One of these proposals was sponsored by the United Kingdom and seven other delegations, the other by the Soviet and its satellite delegations. The Eight-Power proposal was supported by the United States and the Canadian delegations. The U.S.S.R. proposal, if implemented, would leave the South Koreans at the mercy of their Northern neighbours.

The Canadian delegation had from the very outset felt it important that the Asian powers, and in particular India, should take a responsible part in any settlement. The previous day, however, the Indian delegation had indicated that they could not support the Eight-Power resolution on the ground that it contemplated, or at least permitted, the penetration of U.N. forces beyond the 38th parallel and that this might in itself involve the risk of intervention by Communist China and Soviet Russia.

It had been hoped that India would not only support the resolution but would also serve on the commission to be set up thereunder. The United States and the United Kingdom were giving serious consideration to the commission's composition in the absence of India. It was expected that Australia or New Zealand, Chile, Pakistan, the Philippines, Turkey and The Netherlands would serve. This would make six of the seven-member commission contemplated.

The U.S. Secretary of State had personally urged that Canada accept membership on the commission. This appeal had been resisted by Mr. Pearson on the ground that the Canadian attitude had consistently been that Asian powers should assume a major responsibility and should constitute a majority on the commission. If it were possible to amend the Eight-Power resolution in a manner which would enlist Indian support, Canada might then consider nomination.

The British and Americans seemed convinced that, if the United Nations did not authorize General MacArthur to proceed beyond the 38th parallel, action taken so far by the United Nations might prove to have been futile. U.K. and U.S. delegations apparently did not consider too seriously the possibility that Communist China and Soviet Russia might intervene directly.

(Memorandum, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister, Oct. 4, 1950)†

2. Mr. St-Laurent added that the Eight-Power proposal required either the destruction or the unconditional surrender of North Korean forces. If the proposal could be modified to require something less of the North Koreans than unconditional surrender, Indian support might be enlisted.

It was suggested that Mr. Pearson be asked to ascertain whether it would not be possible to modify the Eight-Power proposal so as to require North Koreans to cease all military activity at once in order that the Seven-Power commission might begin work immediately. It would obviously be necessary for U.N. forces to remain in a position to enforce the U.N. cease-fire order. A proposal modified in this manner might well be supported by the Indian delegation and they would also likely approve any military action taken by U.N. forces beyond the 38th parallel to ensure that the U.N. orders were obeyed by the North Korean army.

3. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted with approval the Prime Minister's suggestion and agreed that Mr. Pearson ascertain whether, in order to enlist Indian support, the Eight-Power proposal respecting settlement of the Korean incident could be modified in a manner to require something less than unconditional surrender of the North Korean forces.

KOREA

Following from Heeney, Begins: I reported to the Prime Minister on the status of the Korean debate as we discussed it on the telephone this morning. I told him that you had spoken in support of the Eight-Power Resolution and against the Soviet Resolution. I also reported that Mr. Acheson had made a personal appeal to you to agree to Canadian membership on the new Korean Commission as a means of resisting domestic pressure for the United States to seek membership itself. The Prime Minister agreed that you should continue to resist the nomination of Canada for membership on the Commission in view of the position we have taken concerning the importance of India playing a leading part in the settlement and also the desirability of having Asian representatives in the majority in the Commission.

2. The Prime Minister wondered whether it would be possible, either by delaying passage of the Eight-Power Resolution or in its interpretation by the Unified Command, to go some distance toward meeting the Indian position and so preserve the united front to which we attach so much importance. Even if India's active cooperation is unobtainable, it might be possible at least to reduce public criticism of actions by the United Nations Forces and the new Commission by Indian leaders.

3. The Prime Minister wondered whether some formula might be devised for application of the Eight-Power Resolution which would make it clear that military forces would only be employed in the North when it had become apparent that a fully satisfactory solution could not be obtained without further fighting by United Nations Forces.

4. A possible formula would be to have the President of the General Assembly in conveying the Eight-Power Resolution to the United States Government for the Unified Command state it to be the sense of the Assembly discussions that before military measures are taken north of the 38th parallel, every effort should be made to obtain acquiescence of the North Koreans in the fulfilment of the Resolution. It might be expected then that General MacArthur would broadcast a further message to the North Koreans calling upon them to cooperate in the fulfilment of the General Assembly Resolution, whose military application had been entrusted to him. He would announce that United Nations forces would enter North Korea after "X" days to oversee the demobilization of the North Korean armed forces and to guarantee security during the conduct of elections. United Nations relief and rehabilitation assistance would be given in North and South Korean without distinction. As soon as the purposes of the General Assembly Resolution had been fulfilled, United Nations Forces would be withdrawn from Korea.

5. If you think that this idea offers any hope of obtaining Indian cooperation you will no doubt wish to consult the United Kingdom and United States delegations before speaking to the Indians. In any conversation with Sir Benegal Rau you might wish to point out that you understand it to be the considered view of the responsible military authorities that the roots of aggression in North Korea must be chopped out if the objective of the Security Council Resolution of June 27 to restore peace and security in the Korean area is to be accomplished. India supported this Resolution. You might say that naturally every effort will be made to accomplish the objectives of the Eight-Power Resolution peacefully but that this will require the movement of United Nations forces north of the 38th parallel to take over military equipment and installations and to see to the demobilization of the North Korean armed forces. You might point out that public statements criticizing the United Nations Commander for taking measures deemed necessary to fulfil the Security Council Resolution of June 27 may encourage the Soviet Union or the Chinese Communists to intervene in North Korea. Sir Benegal Rau will realize that it is not in India's interest or anybody else's to say anything that would increase the likelihood of Chinese or Soviet intervention and bring on the possibility of a general war which would have most unfortunate effects for us all. (Your information in New York is that the risk of such an intervention is not great; on the other hand, a United Kingdom appreciation received here today indicates that a real danger exists of Chinese intervention to save a buffer state in North Korea).

6. Even if you don't think it appropriate to talk with Sir Benegal along the lines suggested, you might wish to consider suggesting to some of the delegations that further mention be made of the desire of all United Nations members to see the terms of the resolution fulfilled without further loss of life and property destruction and that the fulfilment of this resolution will not constitute any threat to Korea's neighbours. Ends.

Following for Heeney, Begins: Your telegram No. 67 of October 4th.

1. Immediately following receipt of your telegram under reference, I tried to arrange an interview with Acheson, and prepared a memorandum along the lines of the suggestions contained in your telegram. Unfortunately I found that Acheson had arranged to leave for Washington at an early hour this morning, and both Rusk and Jessup are with him in Washington. I therefore telephoned Wrong and asked him to see Acheson at once and to consult him about the possibility of introducing a resolution along the lines of the suggestion contained in my draft memorandum. Text of the draft memorandum is given in my immediately following teletype. Ends.

Following for Heeney, Begins: Reference my immediately preceding telegram. Following is text of draft memorandum. Text begins:

(1) My Government is not entirely persuaded that it has been conclusively demonstrated at this stage that it is impossible to obtain the submission of the North Korean forces by diplomatic means. Capitulation by the North Koreans would, of course, obviate further sacrifices of life by United Nations forces and further sufferings to the local population. It would also avoid such massive destruction by warfare in North Korea as would greatly extend United Nations tasks of reconstruction and rehabilitation. On the other hand, a clear and unmistakable demonstration that the North Koreans would not cooperate in a peaceful settlement in conformity with a resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations would weaken the propaganda position of the U.S.S.R., might help to reassure the authorities in Peking concerning the United Nations intentions and might also weaken the position of the Communist rulers of North Korea with their own public.

(2) We are of course deeply gratified with the large majority which was secured in support of the joint resolution on Korea in the First Committee yesterday. I cannot help regretting, however, that this resolution failed to carry the judgment of a few states which have often in the past supported us and which are not without influence in Asia, and that it was impossible also to give satisfaction to the desire expressed by certain states for a final effort to secure the submission of the North Koreans to United Nations decisions. I am thinking particularly of India, which could greatly strengthen our position by its support. My own view is that the Indian Government is troubled by fears that our action may seem unnecessarily provocative, or that it may force the Chinese Communists into commitments in Korea from which they could not easily withdraw.

(3) These considerations have also been in the minds of the members of my Government, and I have now received instructions from Mr. St. Laurent to discuss them with you. He has suggested that I canvass with you and other delegations the possibility that, immediately following the passage by the General Assembly of the political committee's resolution, a further resolution be introduced and carried in the following sense —

(a) That the General Assembly should request the President to convey the Assembly's resolution on Korea to the authorities in Pyong-Yong and to request their immediate cooperation in carrying out its terms.

(b) That in any communications he has with authorities in Pyong-Yong, the President should be guided by the principle that the terms of the resolution as adopted by the Assembly must be put into effect.

(c) That pending a report by the President within forty-eight hours from the adoption of this resolution, the resolution should be sent to the Unified Command for transmission to the United Nations Commander in Chief in Korea for his guidance. Text ends. Ends.

KOREAN RESOLUTION

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: Confirming our telephone conversation at 1 p.m., following my talks this morning with you and Riddell, I saw Acheson briefly at 12:30. Before seeing him, I had a lengthy discussion with Rusk and Jessup, both of whom and also Matthews were present when I was with Acheson.

2. I put your proposal before all of them, along the lines of our talk, and I also emphasized the Prime Minister's concern on the grounds set forth in Heeney's telegram to you No. 67 of October 4th. I concentrated on three arguments for further action being taken before United Nations forces (other than the South Koreans in the East) advanced into North Korean territory.

3. My first argument was that the adoption tomorrow of the main Assembly resolution would create a new position which in effect merged from the Assembly resolutions dealing with the unification of Korea adopted in 1947, 1948, and 1949 with the Security Council resolutions of June 25th and 27th, 1950, under which alone military action to repel the North Korean attack had been taken. This created a new constitutional position which the North Korean authorities (and presumably their masters) should have a chance to consider before United Nations troops moved into their territory, even if the prospect was thought very remote that they might agree to accept a peaceful settlement in the form approved by the Assembly. Secondly, I said that we thought it of great importance to make another effort to maintain a united front, especially by seeking to bring India more into line, adding that whatever might be thought of the soundness of Panikkar's judgment, we must at least recognize that it was accepted by Nehru and Bajpai. I showed them Chipman's telegram No. 217 of October 4th† reporting his last discussion with Bajpai. Thirdly, I urged that the Assembly resolution should, if possible, be brought to the notice of the North Korean authorities through some channel other than General MacArthur both to emphasize its great importance and to separate it from the military operations.

4. Strong objection was taken by Acheson, and previously by Rusk and Jessup, to any action which would either interfere with the conduct of military operations or provide an opportunity for bargaining and delay. If, for example, as suggested in your proposal, the President of the Assembly were instructed not to transmit the main resolution to the Unified Command for 48 hours, during which it would be presented to the North Korean authorities and their co-operation sought in its execution, almost certainly the occasion would be employed either to secure a further delay on the plausible ground that they could not reply so quickly or to present some counter-proposal. Such a reaction from Pyong-Yang might be put in terms which would win support from the Indian and other delegations. Meanwhile, the build-up of forces which was in progress in North Korea would be continuing and the probable outcome would be heavier fighting and more casualties later on. Furthermore, the United Nations forces were being re-grouped, so that the imposition of any time limit during which they could not cross the parallel might well involve the command in intricate arrangements delaying movements already in progress. It was unlikely, in any event, that an advance in strength across the parallel would be started for some days because of the re-grouping of forces and because of the continued serious fighting north of Seoul.

5. Acheson did not react favourably to the idea of a secondary Assembly resolution, even if it set no time limit for the acceptance of the main resolution by North Korea. He thought that efforts might be made to amend it on the floor, and he doubted, in any event, whether the President of the Assembly could effectively convey the terms of the resolution to Pyong-Yang by means other than through the Unified Command. (Jessup seemed more favourably inclined to a resolution embodying points A and B of the proposal cited in your telegram to Ottawa No. 63 of today.)

6. We then discussed how to ensure most effectively that the contents of the Assembly resolution was made known in North Korea. Acheson was inclined to think that it should be forwarded to General MacArthur as soon as it was received from the Assembly, with instructions to him to broadcast it immediately and repeatedly and to distribute copies by air over Pyong-Yang and other North Korean cities. MacArthur could be told to centre around it a further and final appeal to the North Koreans to lay down their arms, emphasizing the contents of the resolution and the fact of its adoption by so great a majority of the Assembly. It was considered impracticable to propose that the resolution under a suitable message from the Commander should be delivered to the North Koreans under a flag of truce, as this would open opportunities for bargaining.

7. This discussion has at least had the effect of turning the minds of Acheson and his principal advisers to the problem of how to give the North Koreans a last chance before the occupation of their territory begins. The reluctance to fall in with your suggestions centres around military considerations, and especially the evidence of substantial forces moving southwards in North Korea from the Manchurian border. In an earlier telegram, which I am now repeating to Ottawa, I have given you some information on the military situation. Acheson is, I think, anxious to meet your views as far as he can consistent with military considerations. He had hoped to see you in New York late yesterday, but has been unable to get in touch with you. Ends.

My WA-2398 of October 5th.
There follows the text of a message I addressed to Mr. Pearson in New York this morning, after giving him on the telephone the gist of my discussion with Mr. Acheson. Text Begins:
Top Secret. CANDEL No. 6. October 5th.
Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: I was unable for security reasons to give you in our telephone conversation a summary of the information on the military situation in Korea given me by Rusk this morning.

2. First, the North Koreans are still resisting bitterly North of Seoul and it will probably take a considerable effort to drive them beyond the 38th Parallel.

3. Secondly, a substantial regrouping of United Nations forces is in progress, involving the relief of the corps in the Seoul area by a corps moving up from the south. Until this is completed a major advance by forces (other than the South Koreans in the east) is unlikely. Patrols might possibly cross the parallel fairly soon, but a general advance across it is unlikely for some days.

4. Thirdly, they have no doubt that reinforcements and materiel are moving into North Korea from Manchuria. Rusk cited reports of several columns moving south by various routes, one including twenty-two tanks. While this goes on, of course, air activity over North Korean territory must be continued as otherwise military operations would be hampered.

5. Fourthly, the interposition of a time limit of any sort before the parallel could be crossed might involve the Command in serious difficulties because of the nature of troop movements under way, as well as because of the possibility of a plausible plea for its extension.

6. Incidentally, I gathered that the British brigade is to be moved north of Seoul very shortly. Text ends.

KOREAN RESOLUTION

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: Rusk has just telephoned to me to enquire whether I had anything to pass on to him from you in the light of my discussions at the State Department this morning. I told him of your continued anxiety that some special means should be adopted to give the North Koreans a fair chance of accepting the Assembly resolution and that this should probably involve at least an attempt to transmit the resolution to Pyong-Yong in the name of the President rather than via General MacArthur. I asked him whether it would cause them any difficulty if Entezam were to state on the passage of the resolution that he proposed himself to do his best to bring it immediately to the notice of the North Korean authorities. Rusk said not only that he considered that this would be no embarrassment to them but that it might be helpful if you were to make such a proposal (without moving a formal resolution) during the debate in plenary session tomorrow. I think that this should go some way towards attaining the purposes behind our original proposal. Ends.

TELEGRAM 64 New York, October 5, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

My telegram No. 55 dated October 4th†. Korea.

The first Committee approved last night the eight-Powers resolution on Korea by a vote of 47 to 5 with 7 abstentions. The negative votes were those of the Soviet block and those countries abstaining were Egypt, India, Lebanon, Saudi-Arabia, Syria, Yemen and Yugoslavia. The text of the resolution as adopted is contained in my immediately following message.†[54] Part C of the recommendations was proposed by Israel, Part C of the resolutive section was proposed by Mexico; the three final paragraphs are amendments proposed by Chile, Brazil and the United Kingdom, respectively. The five-Power resolution was defeated by a vote of 46 to 5 with 8 abstentions, including that of India. The vote of both resolutions was taken paragraph by paragraph.

2. Prior to voting on these two resolutions the Committee defeated an Indian resolution which was strongly supported by Israel, calling for the formation of a Sub-Committee of seven members (three of which would be Asian) to be designated by the Chairman of the First Committee, to consider all resolutions, proposals and suggestions relating to the settlement in Korea. This Sub-Committee was to have submitted a resolution which would have commanded the "largest measure of agreement" to the Committee by October 6th; that is to say, within twenty-four hours. The reasons advanced by those opposed to this resolution were that the Sub-Committee's efforts might only result in a re-opening of the debate with no prospect of a genuine compromise when time was of the essence. It was felt that there was little hope of any reconciliation between diametrically opposed views, and even premises on which the two resolutions had been based. As Mr. Austin put it, the differences between the five-nation and the eight-nation proposals were not in "mere words"; there were differences in the basic approaches and ideas. On the other hand, those nations which supported the Indian resolution advanced the argument which may be summarized in the words of the Israeli delegate that "before the die has been cast, a last attempt to achieve genuine understanding (should) be made ... whatever its actual outcome, the effort will never be regretted." It is interesting to note that in the vote which was taken, in addition to the Commonwealth, the Arab and Latin American blocs were split. This resolution was supported by the Soviet bloc. The actual vote was 24 in favour, 32 against (including Canada) with three abstentions.

3. We were rather reluctant not to vote for the Indian resolution, but felt that, because of the time factor and the very slight chance of any resulting compromise, we had no alternative, particularly as at no stage had the Indians produced any compromise of their own.

4. It is expected that a further debate will take place in the plenary session scheduled for Friday. India, who abstained on both resolutions, has reserved its position and will almost certainly make a further statement. Its attitude on that occasion will be of some importance, for its efforts to steer a middle course between East and West have been shown to command a good deal of support. However, it is, nevertheless, expected that the joint resolution will attain the necessary two-thirds vote.

5. As you already know, Australia, Chile, the Netherlands, Pakistan, the Philippines and Turkey have agreed to serve on the new Commission. The seventh member will be elected in the Plenary session on Friday. During the course of the debate in the Committee, we approached the Indians to inquire whether they would be willing to stand for membership on the Commission if nominated. We are informed today that the question has been referred to Mr. Nehru.

6. One or two comments might be added at this point in the discussion of the item. While the attitude of the U.S.S.R. could not be labelled conciliatory, Mr. Vishinsky has been less violent in his language than on previous occasions. This may perhaps be partly due to his poor state of health; he appears to have aged considerably since the last Assembly. However, the same note may be found on both sides, and this can perhaps be attributed to a realization of the seriousness of a highly inflammable situation. The strength of this realization goes a long way, I think, to explaining the support given the Indian resolution; indeed, it has been openly voiced by several of the middle and smaller Powers, who, like ourselves, have cautioned against "exacerbating" the situation.

TOP SECRET

I am sending you by despatch some observations on the discussions and developments leading up to the passing on Saturday last[55] of the eight-Power resolution on Korea, but I feel I should explain to you at once by telegram why the Presidential statement referred to in our telegram No. 84† was not given on Saturday. The explanation is illuminating and somewhat depressing as evidence of the difficulties in the way of establishing close and cooperative relations with the United States delegation in matters of this kind.

2. As you know, we felt here that the Prime Minister's idea that a last effort should be made to persuade the North Korean forces to cease fighting before the resolution authorizing United Nations troops to cross the 38th Parallel was implemented was a wise and practical one. Our first idea was to submit a resolution to this end, but we naturally wished to discuss this procedure with the United States authorities before taking any action. As Acheson, Jessup and Rusk had left New York Thursday night, I asked Mr. Wrong to take up with them at once in Washington the possibility that immediately following the passage by the General Assembly of the Korean resolution, a further resolution should be introduced in the following sense:

[55] Le 7 octobre 1950/October 7, 1950.

"(a) That the General Assembly should request the President, in person if possible and appropriate, to present the Assembly's resolution to the Government of the Republic of Korea in Seoul and the authorities in Pyong Yang and to request personally their cooperation in carrying out the terms of the resolution.

"(b) That in any discussions he carries on with authorities in either Seoul or Pyong Yang the President should be guided by the principle that the terms of the resolution as carried by the Assembly must be put into effect.

"(c) That pending a report by the President, this resolution should be sent to the Unified Command in Korea for its guidance."

3. If the American reaction to this proposal had been a favourable one, we would have discussed it then with the United Kingdom, the Indian, and possibly other delegations. The reaction in Washington, however, was most unfavourable. It was thought there that a resolution of this kind would interfere with the military timetable established by General MacArthur, and give the U.S.S.R. an opportunity to spin out proceedings here with resulting confusion and uncertainty.

4. Our alternative suggestion that without a resolution we should make a proposal, after the voting had been taken, that the President should issue a formal appeal to the North Korean forces to lay down their arms and to cooperate in carrying out the Assembly's recommendation got a more favourable response. Therefore, we drafted a statement to this effect, the text of which is in my telegram No. 96 to Ottawa† and No. 11 to Washington†.

5. We then discussed this statement with the President of the Assembly and the Secretary General. Both expressed their gratification at the Canadian initiative, as, indeed, did Senator Austin, to whom the text had also been referred and who expressed his approval of it. Later, however, the President decided that it would be better if we did not ourselves intervene in the debate, but left it to him, as soon as the vote was taken, to state to the Assembly that he would bring the resolution to the attention of the North Korean authorities with an appeal for their cooperation in carrying it out, and calling on them to lay down their arms. He showed me a draft of this statement which, while adequate, was not very emphatic or convincing. I suggested to him, therefore, that it might be strengthened in one or two particulars. He agreed. I had also asked General Romulo to talk to him, as I thought that the advice and encouragement of a past-President of the Assembly might be useful. General Romulo was very keen that the President should issue some such statement in as strong terms as possible, because of the effect that it would have on Asian opinion. Unfortunately, Romulo, though he was helpful to us in this sense, informed the press of what was developing with the result that there was premature publicity here. This enabled the Russians to learn of what was in the wind and to approach the President and complain that if he made any such statement they would object to it. Also, on Saturday morning, Senator Austin, on instructions as we were told from the highest American quarters, and notwithstanding his previous attitude, argued most strongly with the President that no statement of any kind should be made.

6. The President informed me before the Assembly met on Saturday of this somewhat bewildering development and asked to be released from that arrangement he had made with us by which, in return for our withdrawal from the Speakers' list, he would make the statement on his own initiative. I had no alternative but to agree to this. It was then too late to get on the Speakers' list again and make the suggestion on my own, even if it had been desirable to do so. I told the President it was disappointing that he had changed his mind, but he replied that he had no alternative in view of American pressure. He also informed me that Senator Austin had instructions to see me and explain the whole situation.

7. Meanwhile, I had already discussed the matter with Younger of the United Kingdom delegation, who was in agreement with the procedure which I outlined to him. I had also, of course, informed you that some such statement would be issued, and, in addition, the Canadian Press had got wind of it. In the circumstances it was, therefore, embarrassing and irritating to have this whole carefully arranged programme frustrated by United States last minute interference. The Secretary General, with whom we got in touch Saturday morning, was as disappointed and annoyed by these developments as we were.

8. Shortly before the Korean resolution was passed, a member of the United States delegation (John Ross) came to see me on the floor of the Assembly and added to my surprise and annoyance by saying that he understood that I wished to see Senator Austin about something connected with the Korean resolution. I told him that I did not wish to see Senator Austin about anything, but I understood that he wished to see me in an attempt to explain why the United States had withdrawn from the arrangements previously agreed on. I told Ross that it was now too late to do anything in any event, and that we were surprised and disturbed by the whole business.

9. Saturday afternoon I telephoned Mr. Wrong and told him of developments. He was as surprised as I was and agreed to let those concerned in Washington know how we felt about the matter.

10. The whole episode is a disheartening one, both as an indication of the confusion and division in United States Counsels at the Assembly, and, more important, of their impatience with any line of policy than that which seems to be dictated by General MacArthur and the immediate military situation in Korea. What I find most worrying is the inability of certain people in Washington to realize that it is not enough to occupy North Korea; that it is more important to remove, if possible, the impression in Asian minds, especially in Indian minds, that the policies and designs of the United States in this whole Korean question are not above suspicion. Apparently in Washington they feel that it is more important not to interfere with the military timetable than to make every possible move to bring fighting to an end in a way which would command the approval of Asian members of the United Nations.

11. I feel that we will have to keep this weakness, as I construe it, of the United States Government in mind in our consideration of the problem of Canadian association with the relief and rehabilitation work in Korea (Acheson said they would like us to supply the Director of this work), and of making available Canadian forces for police duties in Korea. If everything in Korea is to be determined by the United States military authorities, and if the Korean Commission, which is now not likely to be a strong one in any event, becomes a tool of those authorities, then the less responsibility we have for subsequent developments in Korea, the better.

DESPATCH 53 New York, October 9, 1950

TOP SECRET

THE EIGHT-POWER RESOLUTION ON KOREA

I am submitting herewith certain background information concerning the eight-power resolution on Korea which was adopted by the Assembly on Saturday last.

2. Although this resolution has now been adopted with substantially more than the required two-thirds majority, and continues the process of strengthening the position of the United Nations as an organization which can take effective and speedy action when required, the very haste of the operation, and the way circumstances required it to be conducted, contributed to certain disappointing and perhaps disturbing developments in the course of the debate. Early and decisive action was of paramount importance if the United Nations were to provide both sanction and guidance in dealing with the military, political and economic problems which now must be faced. But it was of almost equal importance that division of opinion, especially among the Asian states, as to the justification for the Assembly's recommendation should be reduced to a minimum. In this respect the inability to bring India along with the majority, or to meet her position, cannot be regarded as anything less than an important set-back. Also, some of the states which voted for the resolution retained doubts about the wisdom of certain parts of it.

3. The failure to secure more enthusiastic approval resulted partly from the attitude adopted by the Indian delegation itself. As outlined by Sir Benegal Rau in the First Committee, the Indian attitude, while somewhat vague, did provide the basis for an alternative approach to the problem. This alternative approach was indeed similar to our own thinking, providing for a clear statement of objectives coupled with the provision of an opportunity for the North Koreans to indicate willingness to comply with these objectives before military operations (presumably other than those called for by the requirements of the immediate tactical situation) were carried beyond the 38th parallel. This would, Sir Benegal indicated, have taken away the stigma which India associates with the implication in the existing resolution that unification of Korea should be achieved by force of arms; and arms directed, in practice, by General MacArthur.

4. Unfortunately, India made no effort to translate this approach into concrete terms and offered the Committee only the proposal that a sub-committee be formed to hammer out a compromise between the original draft resolution and the counter-resolution offered by the Soviet bloc, which was, of course, completely unacceptable. Attention was therefore diverted from the substantive issues, where Indian initiative might have resulted in some form of compromise, to the formal attempt to go through the motions of reconciling the irreconcilable. Following its current tendency to try to bridge the gap between the Stalinist and non-Stalinist worlds, (at least at international meetings) India failed to make any real contribution which might have brought the majority position closer to her own, thereby giving rise to the suspicion that New Delhi is perhaps more concerned with the appearances of compromise than with finding an acceptable solution to the Korean problem. Perhaps the Indians realize that any solution in Korea can only make the best of a bad job, and therefore they do not wish to soil their hands unnecessarily at this stage in the proceedings. The upshot of all this was that on the sub-committee proposal, India succeeded merely in splitting the ranks of the supporters of the eight-power resolution, and in giving the Soviet some much needed propaganda ammunition.

5. Although this Indian proposal appeared to offer an opportunity to do something to achieve Indian support for Assembly action, we reluctantly came to the conclusion that the opportunity was much more apparent than real, and that an honest appraisal of the probable results could not justify the excuse which would have been granted for delay and for further confusion of the issues involved. The way in which the Soviet delegation grasped at this Indian straw also aroused doubts in our minds.

6. Meanwhile, neither the United Kingdom nor the United States seemed to be making any obvious efforts to find a common ground which would permit Indian support. At least this was the case at Lake Success. It would be interesting to know if any action was being taken in New Delhi. Possibly our High Commissioner could enlighten us on this. I attempted, myself, to sound out the Indian delegation regarding the possibility that they might, eventually, be willing to serve on the proposed United Nations Commission. This would have been important, and I think that they should have realized its importance as a means of convincing the world that the Commission in question was a genuine United Nations one — and not a sub-committee of the Unified Command. Although the results of our approaches along this line here were completely inconclusive, there seemed for a time more hope that supplementary action by the Assembly or its President along the lines suggested in your telegram No. 67 of October 4, to clarify the position and give the North Koreans a chance to avoid further conflict by acceptance of the terms of the resolution, would have some effect. If so, it might have gone some distance to meet the kind of objection which India had raised.

7. Subsequent developments in this matter, however, were discouraging. They are outlined in some detail in our telegram No. 92 (No. 10 to Washington), and it is not necessary for me to repeat them in this despatch.

Mr. Acheson phoned me yesterday morning from Washington to express personally his very great regret at the mix-up which occurred Saturday, and to assure me that he knew nothing about the change of plans which took place. He asked me to accept his word that there was nothing deliberate in the change, but it was the result of an unfortunate mix-up. He himself had thought that everything had been arranged and that the President would make the statement in question which he, Mr. Acheson, felt might do some good and of which he approved. It appears, however, that someone else in Washington heard of this development and without consulting the State Department managed to get instructions to Austin to persuade the President to forego the statement. We shall probably never find out exactly who was responsible for the mix-up, but I am satisfied that Acheson and the senior officers in the State Department were not, and that they were genuinely apologetic and embarrassed by the whole incident. I told Acheson that so far as I was concerned, the matter was ended and I, of course, accepted without reservation his own good faith and regrets. My own feeling now is that the intervention by the unknown American source was inspired by the desire to prevent anybody minimizing the effect of General MacArthur's pronouncement to the North Koreans, which has been given great publicity here. It was also due no doubt to Entezam's anxiety not to tangle with the Russians on the issue of whether he had or had not the right to make such a statement.

Note de la Direction des Nations Unies pour la réunion des chefs de direction

Memorandum by United Nations Division for Meeting of Heads of Divisions

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 16, 1950

EMERGENCY SESSION OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT LAKE SUCCESS

As a result of the Eight Power Resolution[56] on the problem of the independence of Korea, adopted by the General Assembly on October 7, 1950, the Economic and Social Council was called into emergency session on October 12 to develop plans for the relief and rehabilitation of Korea upon the termination of hostilities.

2. On October 11, 1950, the Canadian delegation to ECOSOC, headed by Mr. John Dickey, M.P., was authorized by Cabinet to participate in the planning of a programme for the relief of the civilian population of Korea and the rebuilding of the Korean economy. The Canadian delegation was also authorized "to agree to any financial arrangements outside the regular U.N. budget which would seem to ensure: (a) an adequate level of total contributions, (b) the widest possible sharing of costs, (c) full employment of local resources, (d) a reasonable Canadian share of the total budget, (e) an opportunity for contributions in kind."

3. The opening meeting of the ECOSOC session was at once faced with a resolution introduced by the Soviet Union proposing the ousting of the Chinese Nationalist delegation. This resolution was defeated by a vote of 11 to 7. Canada voted against the Soviet resolution on the grounds that the question of Chinese representation in all United Nations bodies is to be studied by a committee established by the General Assembly.[57] It is noteworthy that the United Kingdom voted in favour of the Soviet resolution.

4. The Council is at present considering a set of three draft resolutions introduced by the Australian delegation, concerning the organization to be established to provide relief and rehabilitation for Korea. Some points in these resolutions display features with which some delegations, including the Canadian, are not in agreement. These points of difference revolve around the questions of obtaining a reliable estimate of Korea's needs, the relationship between the Administrator of the programme and the Unification Commission, and the method for financing the programme. It is expected that within a few days agreement will be reached between a number of delegations sufficient to produce a plan which can be agreed to by all.

RE KOREAN AID

We have now received Dr. Davidson's comments on the draft resolution on Korean aid prepared by the Secretariat. These observations, though extremely useful and consistent with our own views here, are now largely out-dated by the new proposals submitted by the Australian and United States delegations.

2. In briefest terms, the Australian resolution provides for carrying out of relief and rehabilitation by an administrator under the direct control of the Unification Commission. The United States resolution envisages a separate agency under an all-powerful administrator appointed by the Secretary-General and only indirectly required to co-ordinate his activities with those of the Unification Commission. Both resolutions provide for an Advisory Committee of contributing member States.

3. As reported in recent teletypes, we have been active in behind-the-scenes negotiations attempting to reconcile or find suitable compromise between these two points of view. In the absence of explicit instructions from you, our position has been based on the following general principles:

(a) Suitable interim arrangements must be made for maintaining the flow of emergency relief to the Korean people over the arduous winter ahead. In practice, this will probably mean continuation for provision of relief and emergency reconstruction through the Unified Command and E.C.A. pending establishment of more permanent machinery.

(b) Support for the establishment of a special war damage and reconstruction agency to assume responsibilities for longer-term United Nations assistance in Korea. The agency's programme must, however, be realistic and directed toward meeting priority needs. Though necessarily limited to relief and rehabilitation, its main purpose must be to help the economy reach a position as quickly as possible where the natural pattern of Korean development can be resumed under control of the domestic authorities.

(c) The new agency should be under an Administrator with the widest possible measure of administrative independence consistent with the correlation of his activities with those of the Unification Commission, the Unified Command and the Korean civil authorities. This is essential to ensure a dynamic and efficient reconstruction effort un-impeded by extraneous political considerations yet responsive to desirable politico-economic influences. In practice, this means a position between the Australian and United States proposals but it recognizes the fact that, if the United States is to provide the lion's share of the funds, the final plan must as far as possible be based on principles which will be acceptable and appeal to Congress.

(d) We have been pressing for a financial arrangement outside the regular United Nations budget which would conform with the financial criteria set forth in paragraph 6 of your memorandum to Cabinet of October 11th, 1950.† At the moment, a plan is being considered under which United States would declare its willingness to accept between sixty and seventy percent of the total cost. Other States would be requested to participate in a universal scale for sharing the balance. United Nations Committee on contributions will probably be asked to recommend an initial scale. Basic assumption in this approach is that member States will find it more difficult to declare themselves out than to ignore a voluntary appeal. In my immediately following teletype,† I am providing advance confidential text of a United States draft to be introduced when the question of financing is under consideration by the Fifth Committee later.

4. Would appreciate your agreement that the above principles are generally acceptable or an indication of areas in which you feel they might be modified or improved.

Your Teletypes No. 224 and 225,† October 24 — Korean Aid.

We are consulting Davidson and Bryce and will let you have our comments shortly.

Meanwhile we would appreciate further clarification of Para 3(a) of your teletype No. 224. As you know, we are in a peculiarly awkward position in regard to the various requests forwarded from the Secretary-General for immediate relief supplies because there is no appropriation from which funds can be diverted to pay for such supplies. For that reason we were somewhat concerned at the emphasis placed by the Canadian Representative in his statement on immediate provision of emergency relief. You are undoubtedly keeping this difficulty in mind but we are not sure from your interpretation of "suitable interim arrangements", whether the system of direct appeals from the Secretary-General to individual governments for specific commodities, will continue.

We should also be grateful for any information which is now available to you with respect to the estimated cost of the programme, both for immediate emergency relief and the longer-term requirements of relief and rehabilitation.

RE KOREAN AID

Yesterday, the Economic and Social Council continued discussion of "general policy on Korean relief and rehabilitation".

2. A number of paragraphs were approved after discussion which is summarized succinctly on page 3 of this morning's issue of the New York Times.

3. Only one paragraph requires special comment. In substitution for an earlier Soviet proposal the United States had submitted a redraft providing that "in determining Korea's needs for relief and rehabilitation, in drawing up programmes and plans, and in implementing such programmes and plans" the agency created to administer the programme should "consult and utilize the services of the Korean authorities as far as practicable". When the U.S.S.R. representative objected to the qualifying phrase Dr. Lubin of United States quickly amended the phrase to "to the greatest extent feasible". This text was finally adopted by a vote of 15-1-2 with Australia voting against and Canada abstaining.

4. The Australian negative vote and the Canadian abstention were based on our concern that although it might be quite "feasible" for the agency to utilize the services of the Korean authorities, it might not always be "practical" to do so. It was our belief, as well as Australia's, that the Korean relief agency should have some power to decide the circumstances and conditions under which it would be desirable to utilize the services of these authorities. We did not think that "mere feasibility" is a satisfactory test of administrative and operational desirability. After the meeting, Dr. Walker of Australia[58] indicated that he felt strongly enough on this point to consider reopening the question later. By our abstention, we would be in a position to support him if the delegation agrees that this is necessary.

5. Yesterday afternoon, Corley Smith of the United Kingdom delegation provided me with advance information on the latest estimates of Korean needs which have been placed before the special Sub-Committee which is now examining this question. These figures which were submitted recently by the United States delegation are based on confidential estimates covering North and South Korea received from the Unified Command. The requirements in million of dollars equivalents are as follows:

Homes	21.0
Public works and services	31.0
Crops and food	40.5
Other agriculture	14.5
Railways	32.5
Highways, bridges, flood control and irrigation	16.0
Public utilities	30.0
Harbours and docks	2.5
Coastal shipping and fishing	4.5
Industrial facilities	119.0
Motor vehicles	5.5
Total	317.0

Of this total, $94 million would be spent in 1950, leaving $223 million for 1951. Since speaking to Corley Smith, I have been able to secure fuller figures and the explanatory statement† of the Unified Command. These are being forwarded to you by special delivery airmail.

6. The Secretary-General's representative in Korea (Katzin) has also produced an estimate of $250 million for 1951 and "upward of $500 million for the whole programme". This is confusing because earlier he had informed the United Kingdom delegation that if economic development (as opposed to rehabilitation) is cut out, the whole programme should not cost more than $250 million. These figures are disturbing and many delegations are worried that United Nations "capacity" will not be adequate to cover a programme on this scale. The hope has been expressed that the estimates will prove to have been grossly inflated. However, as far as we can ascertain from the State Department, the present figures are already very much reduced below the original estimates submitted by the Unified Command. It is generally agreed that the information provided to date is highly tentative and subject to critical examination in the light of further facts which may become available.

RE KOREAN AID

Immediately after the Council convened yesterday morning to discuss the organizational arrangements for Korean aid, the United States and Australian delegations indicated that if they could be given a few more hours it was likely that they could reconcile their differences and arrive at a common text. Accordingly, the Council adjourned and when it resumed in the afternoon a joint United States-Australian resolution was presented.

2. The joint resolution accepts the United States view that a new agency should be set up under an Agent-General appointed by the General Assembly. Important concessions are made to the Australian view that the activities of the new agency should be correlated closely with those of the Unification Commission. The new formula comes very close to the position which we have been advocating the past two weeks. Subject to minor drafting amendments, we intend to support it strongly. Present indications are that the joint resolution will meet with little opposition in the Council.

3. We have also been carrying on discussions with a number of delegations concerning the financial arrangements that should apply to the new programme. In an earlier teletype† I forwarded a copy of a United States draft resolution submitted recently. It is a compromise between the mandatory and voluntary approaches and is designed, inter alia, to force the U.S.S.R. (and other delegations) to state clearly whether they intend to contribute. In view of the scale of cost suggested in my teletype No. 231 of October 26th, there is some danger that many delegations may feel unable to commit themselves to such an arrangement, although the last paragraph of the United States draft does seem to provide a constitutional escape clause if member States find the burden more than they can bear.

4. A possible alternative which we have been discussing with various delegations would be to call upon the Contributions Committee to work out a scale of assessments after the United States has declared the share it is willing to provide. However, after the scale has been established, each member State would be free to decide whether to pay all, part or none of the assessment. The advantage of this arrangement would be that it would bring a certain amount of moral pressure to bear but would leave delegations free to decide the extent to which they would be willing to share in the cost of the Korean operation. So far, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Australian delegations have shown a distinct interest in the new approach, with the Indian and Chilean delegations not unfavourable. We will carry our discussions further and let you know results.

5. In the meantime, an important tactical problem is raised. It is difficult to decide whether it would be better to try out our new ideas on the Council or to wait until financial arrangements are under discussion in the General Assembly before disclosing our intentions. At the moment our inclination is to withhold our ideas for the General Assembly. It is the Assembly which will ultimately decide on these financial arrangements, and it would probably be better to have all sixty member States participate in such an important decision.

6. We have also been discussing with the United States delegation the question of financing the supplies which have already been provided (largely by the United States) through the Unified Command. If these supplies are to be credited against the new programme, the total United States' percentage share would have to be very large if any residue is to be available for future relief and rehabilitation. We have suggested that the United States might make a unilateral declaration of their willingness to exclude earlier contributions from the plan if other member States meet their contributions quota. In a sense, this would constitute a special inducement to others to provide their share. The United States representatives seem to think that this is the kind of approach which might be attractive to Congress and they are willing to give it serious consideration.

7. In any event, it is fully recognized here that the financial implications of the Korean operation are bound to be very great. Since we are able to indicate that Canada is prepared to provide a fair share of the cost of a sound, reasonable and realistic programme, we are in a strong position to exert an influence on others toward equitable and sound financial arrangements.

PLANS FOR THE RELIEF AND REHABILITATION OF KOREA

At the plenary session, October 31st, the President of the Economic and Social Council reported that the Council had completed its organizational plans and a statement of general policy for Korean relief and rehabilitation. However, the Council had not yet concluded its work on the financing of the programme and, therefore, requested an extension of the time limit for submission of its report to 10th November.

2. The General Assembly decided to grant this extension and to refer the report when it was submitted to the joint Second and Third Committees. Next week therefore we will be giving consideration to the size and nature of the programme and to the basis for financing it.

3. Yesterday, the Council Committee on Korean relief needs concluded its work with an estimate that $365 million would be needed for relief and rehabilitation in Korea until the end of 1951. Of this, some $115 million would be spent by the end of December, 1950, much of it already having been expended by the United States army for emergency relief. This figure contrasts with the estimate of $600 million submitted by the South Korean Government for needs up to the end of 1951.

4. There is no way of knowing what reception the report will receive in the Council, but we believe it would be realistic to assume that Member States will be called upon to contribute at least $200 million to cover the first period of the operation. Longer term requirements can probably be left until more information has been obtained from on-the-spot investigations which can be reviewed in detail by the Council or the General Assembly at a later session.

5. The reactions of various delegations to these amounts have been interesting.

6. The United States delegation is most anxious to see the programme initiated quickly and on a scale likely to ensure that it will be carried through to a successful conclusion. For them, this has become more than a mere relief operation. Fully aware that the United States is now heavily committed in Korea and extremely sensitive to the criticisms that have been expressed both in and out of Congress, the United States delegation has come to look upon a revived and revitalized Korea as:

(a) The final vindication for a tenuous military and foreign policy decision; (and, therefore, the best possible answer to those who have contended that the United States should never become embroiled in Korea).

(b) An equally valid answer to those who have contended that the United States has been carrying more than its fair share of the load. United States delegation members to whom we have spoken seem to feel that a substantial measure of outside support for the aid programme is absolutely essential to convince Congress and the general public that this is a United Nations effort and not exclusively a United States "show"; and

(c) A demonstration of "good faith" to the Korean people and an incentive to others (who might be in a similar position in the future) to "stand against aggression".

7. Viewed in this context, Korea has become symbolic — in a sense, an essential under-pinning for active and dynamic United States support for joint action through the United Nations.

8. With these basic incentives to spur them on, the United States seems willing to make any reasonable concession in order to obtain a substantial measure of outside support for a realistic and worthwhile programme.

9. As indicated in earlier teletypes, they have indicated a willingness to contribute 66 percent to 70 percent of the cost of any new programme and also to recommend to Congress that the supplies already provided through the Unified Command should not be credited against the United States share of any future programme. This latter, of course, is an extremely important concession in view of the very large quantities of United States supplies that have already been used for emergency relief.

10. Other delegations, while agreeing, in principle, that economic aid should supplement the military efforts in Korea, do not attach the same importance to Korean rehabilitation as does the United States. The French, for instance, with renewed demands for rearmament and heavy commitments in Indo-China, seem anxious to avoid large expenditures in Korea. They have been particularly cautious in private conversations and at every opportunity have indicated their preference for a purely voluntary operation. The United Kingdom, on the other hand, though equally extended in South East Asia and elsewhere, has in the main seemed more sympathetic to the United States point of view. The United Kingdom delegation here seems to recognize that a successful programme in Korea might well provide the pattern and precedent for future United States assistance in troubled areas like Indo-China and Malaya. In the early stages, Corley Smith, who heads the United Kingdom delegation in ECOSOC was most attracted to our suggestions for a financial scheme with at least some element of compulsion to universal participation. Apparently, however, his views are not fully shared in London. Yesterday he informed me that, at first glance, the United Kingdom Treasury preferred a "voluntary" scheme. We have told Corley that this is not readily understandable in view of the recent experience with the Palestine Relief Agency[59] and have suggested that he might wish to take the matter up again in order to draw attention to the fact that we might again be heading for difficulties of the same kind facing the Palestine Agency. In the meantime, you may consider this matter sufficiently important for a direct exchange of views with the United Kingdom Foreign Office.

11. These new developments have been causing us considerable concern. We had hoped that, if the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, and a few others would stand together, most of the small States could ultimately be induced to fall into line. As you know, one of the reasons we had developed the new financial approach was to make it more difficult for the USSR (and some other States) to evade their financial responsibilities without experiencing considerable public embarrassment. Apparently, however, the USSR were too astute for this move and took the opportunity afforded by the debate on the preamble to the resolution to virtually declare themselves out insofar as contributions were concerned. The danger now is that with potential leadership from the United Kingdom and France for those who favour a voluntary scheme, it will be most difficult to obtain majority support for any kind of assessment scheme in the Fifth Committee. This is disappointing as we had hoped to avoid the unfortunate situation now facing Member States in relation to aid for Palestinian refugees.

12. We are still convinced that, if anything worthwhile is to be done for Korea, it must be based on action taken at this Assembly. While pressing for a realistic programme in which the costs are widely and equitably shared, we have been stressing that this is the most propituous time to appeal for contributions. We have felt that most Legislatures would find it easier to request special appropriations for Korea while public enthusiasm and support are highest as a result of the recent military successes. In our opinion, sporadic appeals over the next two or three years are most unlikely to meet with a satisfactory response.

13. Very roughly, our idea of the way in which the burden of any programme should be shared is as follows:

United States — 66 percent to 70 percent
United Kingdom — 8 percent
Rest of Europe (excluding USSR) — 6 percent to 10 percent
Canada — 3 percent to 4 percent
Australia and New Zealand — 3 percent
Latin-America — 4 percent to 5 percent
USSR — 5 percent to 10 percent
Others — 2 percent to 4 percent

14. We realize, of course, that in many cases these figures (especially for Europe and United Kingdom) may be unduly optimistic. As indicated above, the USSR and her satellites are unlikely to make any contribution. However, these are the best

"guesstimates" we can make at the moment and provide a rough guide to our thinking.

15. They may have to be modified to take into account efforts now being made to obtain an additional $50 million for aid for Palestinian refugees through 1952. At the moment, we have no advice from you on this question and are planning to avoid any commitments. However, we are aware that our capacity and willingness to contribute to Korea must be directly affected by requests for other projects of this kind. The Arab States are now insisting that their need is as great as that of the Koreans and that their requirements should be financed on a basis similar to that which is ultimately adopted for Korea.

16. Your views on all these questions would be appreciated before the next stage of the discussion which may commence Monday, November 6th.

Your teletype No. 293, November 2nd — Korean relief programme.
Following from Holmes, Begins: We have consulted Deutsch who thinks every effort should be made to secure agreement on financing the programme by a compulsory levy or by some system of assessment which will spread the burden as widely and as equitably as possible. You should continue therefore to work towards universal participation or something as near as possible to that objective. We have asked Canada House to explain our views to the Foreign Office.

In regard to the tentative scale contained in your teletype, we can only point out that until Cabinet authorization is obtained, the Delegation could, of course, give no indication of the amount or percentage of the total budget which Canada would be prepared to contribute. For your own information, Deutsch is of the opinion that any figure for Canada higher than that of the regular assessment scale of the UN, i.e. 3.2% is unrealistic.

Presumably ECOSOC will confine its recommendations to the method of financing and any question of a scale of assessment will be turned over to the Fifth Committee. In the meantime we shall have an opportunity to put the question of a contribution up to Cabinet. Ends.

Your telegram No. 1711 of November 3rd.† Korean relief programme.

1. On basis of your telegram under reference, which was not received here until noon Saturday, Halstead saw Head and Assistant Head of United Nations (Economic and Social) Department of Foreign Office this morning. It was explained that we were strongly in favour of raising funds for Korean relief programme on assessment scale to be determined in Fifth Committee of General Assembly.

2. United Kingdom position as explained to us was in favour of a "voluntary" scheme (on model of expanded programme of technical assistance, not, repeat not, on UNICEF model) to be worked out by special conference of contributing countries to meet during present Assembly session. United Kingdom opposition appears to be not so much against idea of assessment scale (which could in any case be derived from amounts of contributions agreed on by special conference proposed by United Kingdom) as against idea of General Assembly making this decision itself.

3. Disadvantages seen by Foreign Office in our position are:

(a) Fifth Committee of Assembly would include votes of Slav bloc and other countries which have no intention of contributing and would exclude votes of non-members wishing to contribute;

(b) Fixing of scale of contributions by Assembly for duration of relief programme might commit United Kingdom to large outlay in unknown financial circumstances of future and would constitute unfortunate precedent for other United Nations programmes;

(c) General Assembly cannot be relied on for responsible decision in such matter since majority of members contribute small proportion of United Nations budget.

4. Final instructions have already been sent to United Kingdom delegation in New York but I understand these include advice that delegation should seek to reach prior agreement on this question with United States delegation and should particularly avoid presenting divided front in Economic and Social Council. It would therefore seem likely that United Kingdom delegation would be amenable to some compromise proposal, perhaps embodying their idea of the special conference with our idea of assessment scale.

ECOSOC: ITEM ON KOREAN AID

2. The Council considered the report of the Temporary Committee (E/1864) on the extent of relief and rehabilitation required in Korea. The rough estimate of further requirements for the period ending in early 1952 is $250 million.

3. After the President of the Council had invited speakers to make general comments on the extent of aid and on proposed methods for financing, representatives of the following countries immediately began to present what appeared to be excuses for limited, or perhaps non-participation:

(a) Belgium felt that there was inadequate data on which to base an accurate estimate of requirements;

(b) France considered that military estimates are always inflated and it would be difficult for his country to make a contribution because it has not yet recovered fully from its own "war devastation"; in any event, contributions should be voluntary;

(c) Pakistan has had serious floods requiring heavy internal expenditures for relief;

(d) Brazil thought the estimate high compared with UNRRA costs;

(e) Chile favoured voluntary contributions;

(f) USSR supported voluntary contributions and pointed out that the estimate was not reliable because the Committee had not heard representatives of the "Korean people";

(g) Peru replied on earthquakes.

4. The Canadian representative stated that although the final figure could not yet be ascertained with any degree of accuracy, the Committee had indicated generally the basic requirements for the first period of the programme. He said that the United Nations has a particular kind of responsibility because the need for relief is associated with action taken in the face of grave necessity. He referred briefly to the desirability of giving consideration to new ways of raising contributions for international activity so that the Governments could feel certain that the burden would be shared very widely, if not universally. There should be some way in which each country could obtain a reliable indication of its fair share of the financial responsibility.

5. The United Kingdom stated that the present circumstances have arisen out of an act of international solidarity against aggression. It would be necessary to strike a delicate balance in determining the amount of the fund and in methods of allocation. He felt that no one should be assessed a fixed percentage of an indeterminate sum. In any event he preferred that those who refused to contribute should have no voice in the final disposition of funds. He supported the Australian proposal for a "technical assistance" type of conference at which member States would indicate the amounts they are willing to contribute.

6. With so many members already on record in favour of voluntary contributions, it appears most unlikely that we will be able to obtain a favourable vote (in the Council) for any method of assessment. As a special luncheon (during the noon interval) attended by Pollock and Dickey, the United States representative again attempted, (with our help) to convince the United Kingdom, Australia, France and Denmark that the modified assessment would attain the most favourable results in this type of operation. As indicated above, these efforts have not as yet produced a notable flow of converts. We are, however, trying to devise a new approach which will "wed" the concepts of the conference and of the special scale. Meanwhile we will continue to work behind the scenes in order to keep the idea alive until we can make another move in the Fifth Committee of the General Assembly.

7. Before adjournment the legal opinion of the Secretary General on the effect of United States domestic legislation on the United Nations Headquarters Agreement was distributed (E/L.123). The USSR and France suggested that consideration be deferred. The United States intervened to state that the document showed that the Secretary General was not prepared to give an opinion and therefore there was nothing to debate. The request for adjournment was accepted.

8. At the next meeting the Council will probably make its final recommendations to the Assembly on the whole question of Korean aid.

KOREAN RELIEF PLAN

1. The joint Australian-United States plan for relief and rehabilitation of Korea was adopted Tuesday by the Economic and Social Council. The vote was 14 to 0, with Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Soviet Union abstaining. Mexico was absent from the meeting. The highlights of the discussion are described succinctly on page 33 of the issue of the New York Times of 8th November.

2. A footnote might be added to the Times report. The decision to leave the financial arrangements to the General Assembly was entirely consistent with our desire to prevent the Council from dealing with this matter. During the discussion the USSR representative protested against this move. He asserted that the overwhelming majority of member States in the Council had already declared themselves in favour of voluntary financing and that the United States proposal (supported by Canada) was designed to provide time for intensive behind-the-scenes lobbying and the application of "pressure" in favour of some form of assessment. While the USSR criticisms can be discounted in view of their obvious unwillingness to contribute to Korean aid, it is true that we intend to use the period before this question is examined in the Fifth Committee to attempt to persuade others that a new financial approach is desirable if we are to attain the twin objectives of adequate funds and an equitable sharing of the costs.

3. In this connection we have noted the views of the United Kingdom Foreign Office which were relayed in your teletype No. 222 of November 6th.† We feel that the United Kingdom objections do not constitute a valid criticism of the financial approach we have been proposing here, and are only understandable in relation to a straight assessment. As you know we started with the idea of a direct assessment scheme but abandoned it when it became evident that it would be difficult to provide adequate safeguards against future abuse and that, in any event we would be unable to obtain a majority of votes in the Council. Latterly therefore, all our efforts have been directed toward promoting the idea of a scale which would indicate the financial responsibilities of member States, yet would be voluntary in its application.

4. On this basis our comments on the "disadvantages" seen by the Foreign Office and referred to in paragraph 3 of your teletype are as follows:

(a) We do not see the relevance of this objection. The Slav States control only five votes in the Assembly and their participation in a discussion of the basis for assessments should only have a significant effect if the votes of others are evenly divided. Under those circumstances we could hardly avoid defeat. If, on the other hand, we could obtain a favourable vote from the Fifth Committee for establishment of a scale, we feel that this would require the Slav States to contribute or face public embarrassment when they declare themselves out. We agree that non-contributors should have no voice in the expenditure of funds. However, this is an entirely different question and not directly related to the establishment of a scale. Arrangements can always be made to accept contributions from non-United Nations members.

(b) As indicated above, no proposal has been submitted for the establishment of a mandatory scale. The scale we would propose in the Assembly merely would be a target which would render explicit the financial responsibility of individual States. As such it would be aimed primarily at those States which are inclined to ignore voluntary appeals. For the United Kingdom and other countries which are used to taking their financial responsibilities seriously, the commitment under the new approach would not be significantly greater than under a purely voluntary arrangement. In any event, if some member States feel that the precedent might become embarrassing later, we could provide a suitable safeguard by agreeing that the scale would be valid only for one year, after which it would be subject to review in the light of changed circumstances.

(c) This seems to put the cart before the horse. At the present time the Assembly has the power to make decisions leading to large financial expenditures. There is no way to prevent the majority of members from introducing and passing such proposals unless we can find a way to develop (in them) a sense of financial responsibility. Although (under the purely voluntary approach) we can refuse to provide funds for carrying out these programmes, the political and moral pressures are so great that we have rarely, if ever, been able in practice to refuse to respond to these requests. If the desire is to induce responsibility, it must be at the time the programmes are initiated. We feel here that nothing could exert a more restraining influence than the necessity for paying a fair share of the costs. The desire for safeguards should not blind us to this basic fact.

5. In regard to your teletype No. 217 which provides Deutsch's comments on the tentative scale outlined in our teletype No. 292, perhaps we should have stressed that it is our intention to attempt to limit the Canadian share to three percent. We are fully aware that any contribution above our regular United Nations assessment might be difficult to explain to the Cabinet and Parliament. On the other hand, we must recognize that if the USSR and others contribute nothing this might mean a short fall in total contributions of between ten to fifteen percent. We would not be inclined to go any further than other member States to cover this deficit. However we did wish to indicate to you, that if you are anxious to see the Korean programme launched successfully, there might be circumstances under which Canada might be willing to consider a slightly higher proportion of the whole. Of course any additional Canadian expenditures that may arise out of the changed military situation in North Korea would have to be taken into account.

6. We are now attempting to find support for an approach combining the idea of a scale with that of a special conference. In brief, our idea is to request the Fifth Committee to draw up a scale after the United States has indicated the share it will pay. (The actual scale might be formulated by the Contributions Committee.) This scale would be circulated to member States only as an indication of their possible share of the total. Then they would be invited to a conference where they would indicate the amounts they are actually willing to contribute. As this would be somewhat softer than our earlier version, it might possibly obtain wider support.

7. In your teletype you suggest that the present instructions to the United Kingdom delegation are flexible enough to permit them to accept some such proposal. The United Kingdom delegation is, however, being advised by a Treasury official with whom we are not always in agreement. Yesterday, we found them unresponsive to our request for joint action along the lines referred to above. We do not wish to suggest a further approach to London. However, if there are any arguments in our teletype which have not already been advanced, you might consider the desirability of further action in that direction.

KOREAN AID PROGRAMME

1. Members of the United States, United Kingdom, Australian, and Indian delegations attended a private meeting held in our conference room this morning to consider the financial and other arrangements for relief and rehabilitation in Korea.

2. The United Kingdom again expressed its opposition to our proposal for the development of a scale in the Fifth Committee as an indication of the shares member States might be willing to contribute at a special conference or a special meeting of the Assembly to be held later. However, after a lengthy exchange of views, those present agreed that they might be prepared to consider the establishment of a special "negotiating" sub-committee of the Fifth Committee which would be given responsibility to approach member States and to request an advance indication of the shares they might be willing to contribute. The objective of the negotiating committee would be to bring forcibly to the attention of all member States their financial responsibilities under the programme. Since all members could expect to be approached officially they would have to contact their Governments for instructions. This might help to overcome the natural inertia or outright resistance to an appeal of this kind. At the same time, those member States unable to respond now for genuine reasons would still have an opportunity to do so later at the "conference". This two-stage approach (a preparatory stage and a conference stage) should produce the best assurance of favourable results short of some kind of assessment.

3. This whole question will undoubtedly be raised in the meeting of Joint Committees Two and Three, which will commence discussion of the Council's recommendations on Korea tomorrow. However, a decision will probably not be required until the matter has been examined in the Fifth Committee.

4. We have also had private discussions of the total requirements for the first year of the Korean operation. As you know, the committee of the Economic and Social Council brought in a rough estimate of $250,000,000 for the period ending in early 1952. Grave doubts have been expressed here as to the possibility of collecting this amount and it has been generally agreed that the Fifth Committee should scale the figure down to $200,000,000. The United States have indicated that they feel certain that they will be able to pledge nearly 70 percent of this amount and to claim no off-setting credit for supplies already provided through the Unified Command.

5. However, their capacity to do so will depend very much on their ability to convince Congress that there will be very wide, if not universal, sharing of the costs. (They are, of course, not expecting any contribution from the USSR). They have suggested that it would help them considerably if a few countries like the United Kingdom, Australia, and Canada could make a sizeable pledge to the negotiating committee at the same time as the United States does so. We have not yet indicated our reaction to this proposal, but said that we would take it up with you.

6. If you agree, our inclination would be to make an original pledge of about $5,000,000 (Canadian) or 2 and one half percent of a $200,000,000 programme (after the United States have already pledged at least 66 percent of this amount). We could also indicate our willingness if necessary, to put up another one half of one percent when pledged contributions from other member States have passed 95 percent of the total requirements. In this way, we would be able to help the United States by making a sizeable initial pledge, retain a small reserve for a second round appeal, and at the same time safeguard ourselves against the possibility that Congress would later decide to scale down on the amount originally pledged by the United States delegation.

7. Your comments on these matters would be appreciated as soon as possible.

FINANCING OF KOREAN AID AND PALESTINE REFUGEES

It will soon be necessary to indicate our views on the financing of Korean relief and rehabilitation and of aid for Palestine refugees. The Fifth Committee has been asked to provide recommendations on the financial arrangements appropriate to each of these programmes and is only awaiting the views of the Advisory Committee on administrative and budgetary questions before dealing with these questions.

2. It appears that substantial support is now gathering for a procedure along the lines of that mentioned in our teletype No. 365 of November 10th. Under this approach, if adopted, a negotiating sub-committee would be established by the Fifth Committee. The sub-committee would approach member Governments for an indication of the shares they are willing to contribute as a preparatory stage for a special meeting to be held later.

3. In confidential conversations yesterday with the United States, United Kingdom and Australian delegations on the Korean aid programme, we were advised that they are prepared to go along with the new procedure. After opposition to our original proposals for an assessment scale, the United Kingdom delegation is now willing to support what they term a "semi-mandatory" approach. One of the members of their delegation today informed me that the United Kingdom hopes to be able to pledge a contribution of at least ten percent (10%) of the first year's requirement for the Korean programme. The Australian delegation indicate that their Treasury is considering a contribution equivalent to their regular United Nations percentage. The United States is still thinking in terms of contribution of between 66 and 70% of the total. In each case their position may, of course, be modified if the response of other member States is unsatisfactory.

4. In view of the possibility that we will soon be required to participate in the debate in the Fifth Committee, it would be desirable for us to have your views on the following questions:

(a) Do you agree that we should support the proposal for a Negotiating Committee or would you prefer that we continue to press for a direct assessment? In our opinion, the latter course would not be likely to attract much support. If circumstances should prove propitious we might try later to have the idea of a scale revived when working out the terms of reference of the Negotiating Committee.

(b) If a Negotiating Committee is established should Canada seek membership? There are arguments on both sides of this question: On the affirmative we might be able to exert a favourable influence on the financial arrangements. On the negative side we must recognize the fact that the Committee will have an exceedingly difficult and possibly embarrassing task. In our opinion, we should accept membership only if we are in a position to make a reasonable contribution perhaps along the lines suggested in paragraph six of our teletype No. 365.

(c) Can you provide us with any indication of the nature, extent and conditions for any Canadian contribution to Korean aid? A definitive decision is not required at the moment, but an indication of your general reactions to our earlier proposals would be extremely helpful. When do you propose raising the question in Cabinet?

5. All the above questions will also arise in our consideration of the financial arrangements for providing further aid for Palestine refugees. In this case, however, we have already indicated our political reservations toward provision of further funds before there is clearer evidence that a real effort will be made to achieve a final settlement of this problem.

6. Your views on these questions would be appreciated at the earliest possible date.

The United States, Chile, and Uruguay which had also decided to suggest amendments to the ECOSOC resolution, have now agreed upon the text of a joint set of amendments. The text of the joint amendments will be found in my immediately following teletype.†

United States, United Kingdom and Chile made brief statements urging member Governments to endorse ECOSOC resolution as it will be amended by the jointly sponsored amendments. RE FINANCING KOREAN AID AND PALESTINE REFUGEE PROGRAMMES

1. The Fifth Committee decided this morning to recommend the appointment of the negotiating committee of seven or more members for the purpose of negotiating "during the current session of the General Assembly with member and non-member States the amounts which Governments may be willing to contribute to the programmes for such assistance."

2. In the course of a general statement in which we reiterated our belief that a wider and more equitable financial base for United Nations programmes of this kind was necessary, we expressed a preference for separate committees to deal with each of these programmes. However, for a variety of reasons, including administrative convenience, the Fifth Committee decided, on strong United States and United Kingdom insistence, to establish one committee. It was agreed, however, that the Committee would report separately on each programme.

3. In discussion within delegation this morning, it was agreed that the attitude of Canadian delegation toward membership on the negotiating committee should be dependent upon Canadian Government's willingness to contribute to each of these programmes. In this connection, we have your teletype outlining your proposals to the Cabinet tomorrow regarding Korea. If accepted, these proposals would ensure strong and constructive voice for Canada in any future deliberations on the Korean aid. However, we have not yet received any indication of your intentions re Palestine.

4. In conversation with Bryce today, Pollock suggested that our course would be clearer if a decision could be reached now regarding our general attitude toward Palestine contribution. We recognize that the size and nature of our contribution, if any, must necessarily take into account the very different factors affecting this programme. In fact, our proposal for separate committees today was based on feeling that entirely different financial approach might be necessary.

5. If Cabinet decide in favour of a contribution for Korea and against contribution for Palestine refugees, our inclination would be to stay off negotiating committee. If, on the other hand, we are likely to contribute to both these programmes consider we might participate with advantage on negotiating committee and thereby help to evolve sounder financial arrangements and wider financial base both these programmes.

6. Your views on these questions would be appreciated as soon as possible after Cabinet decision has been reached.

KOREA; U.N. PROGRAMME FOR RECONSTRUCTION

29. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 11th, 1950, said that the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations had prepared organizational plans for the relief and rehabilitation of Korea and had drawn up a statement of policy to govern the execution of the programme. The Council's recommendations to the General Assembly called for the establishment of a United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency under the direction of a United Nations Agent-General responsible to the General Assembly. The plans provided for co-ordination with the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea, the designated Korean authorities, appropriate specialized agencies, and inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations. An Advisory Committee consisting of representatives of five member governments, would advise the Agent-General on certain aspects of the programme.

It was estimated that a budget of $250 million would be needed to implement the programme during the first year. The General Assembly, however, might reduce this total to $200 million. The United States would probably assume 66 to 70 percent of the total cost of the programme, and in addition would probably not claim any offsetting credit for supplies worth approximately $100 million, already provided as military relief through the Unified Command.

It was recommended that the Canadian delegation to the General Assembly be authorized to agree that the Canadian government, subject to Parliamentary approval, would contribute to the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Programme in Korea 3.2 percent of the total funds required for the first year subject to the condition that the contribution would not exceed $8 million. The delegation might, in its discretion, confine the initial pledge to 2.5 percent and indicate that an additional .5 or .7 percent might be forthcoming provided certain conditions, such as adequate participation by other member countries, etc., were fulfilled.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Nov. 21, 1950 Cab. Doc. 262-50)†

30. Mr. Pearson added that if Korea were simply liberated and left in ruins without any effort on the part of the United Nations to unite and rehabilitate the country, the intervention would have achieved no useful purpose and the Communists would probably take over in a very short period of time. In the circumstances, it was important that the United Nations should make every effort to ensure that Korea were united under a democratically elected government and started back on the road to recovery through essential rehabilitation and reconstruction measures.

31. The Prime Minister said that the proposed Canadian contribution of 3.2 percent of the total funds required during the first year seemed reasonable.

32. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that, subject to Parliamentary approval, Canada would contribute to the United Nations relief and rehabilitation programme in Korea 3.2 percent of the total funds required for the period January 1st, 1951 to early 1952 provided the contribution did not exceed $8 million; it being understood that the initial contribution might be limited to 2.5 percent on the understanding that an additional .5 or .7 percent would be forthcoming if certain conditions were fulfilled.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au sous-ministre de la Défense nationale

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of National Defence

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], November 22, 1950

Dear Mr. Drury:

We have received several urgent appeals from the Secretary-General of the United Nations to assist in the provision of emergency relief to the civilian victims of the Korean war. As I explained to you on the telephone, we have been unable to take any action on these appeals, although some of the commodities required are available in Canada, because of the difficulty of financing an immediate contribution in the present peculiar situation when Parliament though not meeting is formally in session. A Governor General's Warrant is, therefore, impossible, and the alternative of postponing any help until Parliament approves the estimates of this Department some time in February or March would mean that Canada could take no part in U.N. efforts to alleviate the critical conditions in Korea during this very pressing emergency period when the immediate provision of food, clothing, shelter and medical supplies is required to prevent widespread misery and disease.

It has occurred to me that a way out of the difficulty might be found by using military funds to finance an interim contribution of relief supplies. The United States has so far carried the lion's share of relief activities in Korea by using part of its military appropriation to provide supplies through the Unified Command, and you will recall that Defence funds were used to pay for military relief carried out by the Canadian forces in Europe in 1944 and 1945. Now that the Canadian army is to serve in Korea, I wonder if it would be possible to divert a portion of the Defence appropriation to finance a contribution of relief supplies for that country.

I should be very grateful if you would consider this suggestion and let me know whether you think it practicable. If you are prepared to agree to the procedure in principle, we could then consult the Department of Finance on detailed arrangements, and request Cabinet authorization of an immediate contribution for Korean relief.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

2. I am happy to leave to the delegation the discretion to follow your own judgement on whether Canada should accept membership on the Negotiating Committee. My own view is that, if you are pressed to accept membership, you should do so. You should not, however, accept the chairmanship of the Committee and you should press for a relatively large committee, the membership of which is not limited to willing contributors. It would be useful if the Committee included a number of states which are in the habit of giving verbal support to programmes of this kind but which have not in the past been willing to bear their full share of the financial commitments.

1. We have been wondering whether it is proposed to go ahead immediately with the plans to set-up the U.N. Current developments in Korea would indicate that the estimated requirements of relief and rehabilitation on the basis of which the U.N. programme was worked out, may have to be revised and that the time-table for the beginning of operation for UNKRA may need to be altered. I am not, of course, suggesting that we should initiate such ideas, but it seems pretty obvious that regardless of the outcome of military events in Korea, the relief and rehabilitation needs are going to be different from those anticipated a month ago, and that the requirements and budget as estimated by ECOSOC are already out of date. I should be interested to have your own views in this connection, and to learn whether any ideas along these lines are being mentioned at Lake Success.

FINANCING OF KOREAN AND PALESTINE RELIEF

At its first meeting yesterday morning (December 6th) the Negotiating Committee elected H.H. Jam Saheb of Nawanangar (India) Chairman.

2. It was decided that despite military reverses in Korea the Committee should proceed with its work of contacting member states and try to obtain an indication of the amounts their Governments might be willing to contribute to the financing of this programme. This course was considered essential at this time as an expression of confidence in the successful outcome of United Nations efforts in Korea.

3. The Negotiating Committee will meet with member states and seek pledges for contributions, on the clear understanding that all such pledges will be "subject to approval of their appropriate constitutional bodies" and that actual contributions will be called for only when the military and political situation in Korea is clarified. Contributions in kind or in local currencies will be urged where convertible currencies cannot be provided. For the purpose of these consultations, the member states will be approached in groups, e.g., Latin-American states, Commonwealth countries, European countries, etc., by the member of the Negotiating Committee most likely to receive their confidence and support.

4. In the light of this new approach it was tentatively agreed that the special conference at which member states will make firm financial commitments should not be called until it becomes clear that it will be propitious to prepare for commencement of the activities of the United Nations Korean reconstruction agency.

5. The United States then indicated that the Administration would approach Congress for a contribution of 65 percent of the new programme. Senator Sparkman (U.S.) stated that this percentage referred to future requirements and that the Administration would recommend to Congress that the United States should claim no credit for relief supplies already provided through the Unified Command. Lord Crook for the United Kingdom then stated that it was the intention of the United Kingdom Government to request parliament to vote 8,000,000 pounds sterling to a $200 million programme or 10,000,000 pounds if the $250 million programme is to be carried out. John Dickey (Canada) indicated that when the situation becomes clear the Canadian Government would be willing to request parliament to appropriate $5 million (Canadian) for Korean relief, and, further, that if a satisfactory response was evoked from other member states, Canada would be prepared to consider an increase in its contribution to an amount not exceeding three percent of the total subscribed to the programme by all members. Dickey stressed that the attitude of the Canadian Government and Parliament would be strongly affected by the response of other member states. Since many Governments undoubtedly would be in the same position it was important for the Negotiating Committee to stress the importance of a universal response to all those appearing before it.

6. None of those present were ready to indicate their position re contributions for Palestine refugees, but the United Kingdom and the United States indicated that they hoped to be able to do so shortly.

RE KOREAN AND PALESTINE AID

1. At meetings Friday and Saturday, the Negotiating Committee interviewed two groups of member states re prospective contributions to the two aid programmes.

2. Latin-American delegations were first to appear with following results:

Korean Aid

(a) Ecuador, Chile, Venezuela and Haiti stated that their Governments would furnish all possible aid. However they could not indicate exact amounts pending receipt of final instructions.

(b) Peru stressed inability to help, considering earthquakes.

(c) Mexico pressed for differentiation between supplies for relief and those to be used for rehabilitation. The Mexican representative intimated that his Government would be willing to contribute to emergency relief, but states that countries like Mexico with low standards of living could not be expected to aid in rehabilitation. This provoked long, inconclusive decision [sic] of relationship between relief, rehabilitation and development.

(d) Brazil stated that the executive would recommend that Congress appropriate 50 million cruzeros (approximately $2,700,000 United States) to be spent in Brazil for commodities required in Korea.

(e) Uruguay which has already contributed $2 million for interim aid did not testify.

3. None of these delegations were ready to give any indication of their position re Palestine aid.

4. Saturday morning representatives of Australia, Denmark, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden and Belgium appeared before the Negotiating Committee with the following results:

(a) Australia will recommend that Parliament provide supplies and facilities (subject to availability) up to an amount not exceeding 1.75 percent of the total pledges to the Korean programme. The maximum contribution is to be the Australian equivalent of $3.5 millions for a $200 million programme or $4.375 millions for a $250 million programme. Against this contribution, Australia intends to claim credit for interim aid already provided through the Unified Command.

The Australian Government does not intend to recommend a further contribution to Palestine aid. In explanation of this decision the Australian representative explained that his country's interest in the particular region was not very great. Furthermore, (he said), Australia had already provided substantial indirect assistance to the refugees through its contributions to the International Children's Emergency Fund. The Children's Fund has spent large sums for the refugees and Australia has provided almost 10 percent of the total resources of the I.C.E.F.

(b) New Zealand — The New Zealand representative has not yet received instructions re Korea, but he felt certain that his Government would make a contribution in unconvertible New Zealand currency. He is doubtful that New Zealand will contribute to Palestine fund.

(c) Norway hopes to provide between one quarter and one half of 1 percent of the total Korean programme. The minimum Norwegian contribution will be the equivalent of $500,000 (United States) to be spent entirely for purchase of supplies in Norway or for chartering of Norwegian ships. Norway cannot contribute more than 100,000 Norwegian kroners ($14,000) for Palestine aid.

(d) Sweden, Denmark, Belgium had not yet received instructions, but expect them shortly. Denmark intends to contribute 300,000 Danish crowns ($14,000) for Palestine.

(e) Netherlands — representative did not appear but sent word that he was awaiting instructions.

5. Before meeting adjourned, Senator Sparkman (United States) and Lord Crook (United Kingdom) made a special appeal to the Australian delegation to reconsider their position re Palestine. Senator Sparkman stressed that if Governments were to adopt a purely regional approach to financing of United Nations activities, the long-term implications might be disastrous. The success of the United Nations depended very largely on universal support for and acceptance of its decisions. The Australian delegate agreed to again bring these considerations to the attention of his Government.

6. On the whole, we might sum up the results of the two days discussion by saying that we are rather disappointed (though not entirely surprised) by the Latin-American response, but heartened by that of Australia and some of the North West European countries.

7. The Committee hopes to interview representatives of the Arab and other Middle Eastern states on Tuesday.

8. You might wish to consider whether it would be desirable to provide the press with an indication of the nature, size and conditions for the Canadian offer of assistance for Korea. Although our offer only has been made within the confines of the "closed" sessions of the Negotiating Committee there is always a danger that with so many member states participating in these discussions, confidential information may "leak" to the press. Garbled or inaccurate reports might prove embarrassing to you in Ottawa.

9. We would also appreciate early information regarding Cabinet decision on aid for Palestine refugees. We understand that this question was on Cabinet agenda last Wednesday.

PERSONAL & CONFIDENTIAL New York, December 14, 1950

Dear Robert [Ford],

You must forgive me for my failure to respond to your request for information or to keep you very well posted in general. I wish I could blame it all on the Korean emergency. This is no doubt partly the reason, but the principal reason is that I am involved in meetings all day, every day, and then find it very difficult to concentrate on correspondence after nine o'clock in the evening.

In your telegram No. 383 of December 6, you raised the question as to whether it was proposed to go ahead immediately with the plans to set up the Korean Reconstruction Agency. This telegram arrived just about the time we had the first meeting of the Negotiating Committee. There was a decision in the Delegation before that meeting that we should proceed for the time-being at least with all our plans just as if the Chinese had never entered the war. It would certainly look very bad indeed if we acknowledged at this time that it might be the Chinese rather than ourselves who would be reconstructing Korea. This was the attitude adopted by both major and minor delegations at the Negotiating Committee with some slight dissent from Uruguay. I believe that Sid Pollock sent a report to Ottawa on the Negotiating Committee which would, I imagine, answer the principal points you raised. I understand from Sid that it is still the intention to proceed with plans as previously adumbrated, but that the conference at which the final pledges of support would be made will not take place until the situation in Korea is somewhat more certain.

I have been trying to get away from here during the past week, but it now looks as if I will have to remain until Sunday. The situation is still a little cloudy, but I have every hope of showing up in the office sometime on Monday. If it is still alright with you, I should like to go home for a few days at Christmas, possibly from Friday until Tuesday. If your plans have changed, however, don't hesitate to let me know.

With best regards.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN [HOLMES]

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Your teletype No. 422 of December 15th,† reference United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency.

At plenary session yesterday (December 15th) President of the Assembly named United States, United Kingdom, India, Canada and Uruguay to Member Governments Advisory Committee for Korean Aid.

2. We were confidentially informed that Canada had been substituted for France after France had signified unwillingness to serve. Presumably French refusal is related to fact that her Government has not been able to announce a contribution to the programme. Earlier Secretariat had enquired as to our attitude and had been informed that Canada would accept, but was not seeking membership.

3. It is not possible to forecast locale of meetings of the Advisory Committee. In the Economic and Social Council it was agreed that the Advisory Committee would normally meet at United Nations headquarters (New York) but that it might meet "elsewhere" (including Korea) if that seemed desirable for the effective performance of its work. Accordingly, locale for meetings is bound up with the now unpredictable future of the whole Korean operation.

1. Negotiating Committee met again yesterday to interview some of the countries which had been unable to attend previous meetings. Denmark, Philippines, and Union of South Africa made it known that they would not attend the meeting because of lack of instructions. Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Nicaragua, Panama and the Soviet bloc did not attend meeting nor make other response.

2. The following is the substance of statements made by representatives present with regard to Korean aid.

(a) Brazil confirmed that Bill providing for estimate of $2,700,000 was being discussed preparatory to submission to the Brazilian legislature.

(b) Argentina, Venezuela, Peru, Paraguay, Pakistan, Liberia and Yemen were still awaiting instructions but confirmed that their Governments had the matter under active consideration.

(c) Saudi Arabia pledged a contribution of $10,000 in its currency.

(d) Netherlands promised one million guilders.

(e) Syria pledged 25,000 Syrian pounds.

(f) Lebanon declared that it was unable to contribute anything further besides the $50,000 contribution already made.

(g) Turkey declared itself unable to contribute anything towards Korea. The Turkish representative made reference to the contribution of military assistance, to the recent floods encountered in his country and to the thousands of refugees from Bulgaria whom the Turkish Government has to look after.

(h) Belgian representative made it understood that his Government would contribute to both funds to the best of its ability.

3. With regard to the contributions for the Palestine refugees the statements made may be summarized as follows:

(a) Brazil, Argentina, Venezuela, Peru, Paraguay, Pakistan, Belgium, Liberia and Yemen had yet no instructions from their Governments, but they were all expecting final word from their Governments in the very near future.

(b) Saudi Arabia pledged $40,000 and a hundred tons of fuel oil, the value of which has been apparently estimated at around $70,000.

(c) Syria pledged .11 percent of the $55,000,000 required.

(d) Lebanon pledged a contribution equivalent proportionately to its United Nations budget contribution.

(e) Turkey declared itself unable to contribute any further to Palestine's refugees except for what the Turkish Red Crescent might be prepared to do.

(f) By far the most encouraging declaration was made by Senator Sparkman on behalf of the United States. You will recall that the United States representative had previously stated that in this instance the Administration had decided not to make any pledge until a clear picture had been formed of what the other countries, particularly of the Middle East, were prepared to do. Yesterday the United States representative stated that the Administration had decided to recommend a contribution to the Palestine refugees fund of up to fifty percent of the target, namely, a United States contribution of $25,000,000. This pledge was, of course, subject to the constitutional difficulties which might arise.

4. With the various contribution promised at yesterday's meeting the financial picture for these two funds is approximately as follows:

(a) Korea — A total of $210,000,000; has been conditionally pledged by various member Governments, leaving still $40,000,000 to be provided. The Chairman, Corley Smith of the United Kingdom, who presided in the absence of the Indian representative, felt that this could be looked upon as encouraging results, but stressed, nevertheless, the importance of securing at the earliest possible date the amount outstanding, since a great part of the $210,000,000 had been pledged on the condition of proportionately equivalent contributions by all the member Governments.

(b) Palestine — The United States promise has improved the situation very substantially. The United States contribution brings the total promised to $37,000,000, leaving $18,000,000 outstanding. However, this total includes an offer of $2,800,000 from Israel, in lieu of claims by individuals with respect to property, a matter which is outside the scope of the Committee's jurisdiction.

5. Representative of France expressed the view that it would be less difficult for Governments such as his own to vote contribution if Agent-General were appointed at once.

6. The Committee has adjourned until about January 8th, 1951, at which time it will reconvene for a three or four-day period. All delegations will then be asked again to appear before the Committee, either to confirm their pledges or to clarify their position. This will be the last informal meeting before the formal conference. In the meantime, members of the Committee have been urged to continue their informal discussions with the various delegations here. The countries have been divided for this purpose in four groups.

KOREAN AID PROGRAMME

In the course of the Negotiating Committee you may find it useful to know the official attitude toward the form of the Canadian contribution to the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency.

2. You will remember that Cabinet authorized a maximum contribution of 3.2% of the total budget provided that budget does not exceed 250 million dollars and that no conditions were attached by Cabinet to the Canadian contribution. Following the Cabinet decision we took up this particular aspect of the matter with the Department of Finance, urging that the full contribution be untied, either to purchases in Canada, or to restrictions in respect of convertibility of funds. We suggested that at the appropriate time it be made clear that Canada would expect the Agent-General to make purchases in Canada when required commodities were available at competitive prices, but that we should put no definite restrictions on the use of the money. The Department of Finance has informed us that they have no objection to the procedure proposed by us, and would suggest only that the administrative arrangements should provide for bringing to the attention of the Agent-General any surpluses of suitable commodities which might develop in Canada in the future.

3. Copies of the correspondence between the two Departments are attached.†

SECRET [Ottawa], December 28, 1950

Dear Sir:

Receipt is acknowledged of your letter dated 22 November, 1950, in which you advise me that several urgent appeals have been received from the Secretary-General of the United Nations for Canada to assist in the provision of emergency relief to the civilian victims of the Korean War and suggest that the difficulty of finding funds for this purpose might be met by using military funds to finance an interim contribution of relief supplies.

I have asked the Deputy Minister of Finance whether he would consider this to be an appropriate use of military funds, and he has advised me that he does not believe that would be appropriate to use the Defence Services Appropriation for this purpose. He points out that this appropriation is to provide for the Defence Forces of the Navy, Army and Air Services and that it does not seem to him that the purpose for which it has been granted can be construed to include emergency relief to the civilian victims of the Korean War given under the auspices of the United Nations. The situation that applied during the last war was quite different in that funds provided for military relief were from the War Appropriation under which the Government had wide powers to use the money for war purposes of all kinds.

I therefore regret to advise you that it would appear to be impossible for this Department to comply with the suggestion made in your letter of 22 November.

Yours very truly,

KOREA

Mr. Collins. Last week the Chinese Communists made good the warning that they would not "stand idly by" if United States forces crossed into North Korea. The State Department informed our Embassy in Washington on November 3rd that about 16,000 Chinese Communist soldiers are now engaged in Korea. According to the most recent Intelligence reports received at that time, elements of several Chinese regular units had been identified, although Chinese units were not fighting in large separate formations. More recent information from the press, however, would seem to indicate that as many as three full Chinese divisions — over 30,000 men — had joined the fighting.

It was also reported that large supplies of arms and equipment have come from Chinese Manchuria to bolster North Korean resistance. As a result, remnants of the retreating North Korean army, joined by Chinese troops, were suddenly able to launch a fierce counter-attack. At the same time, enemy planes again entered the conflict, presumably from Chinese bases. In the face of this assault, United Nations troops were forced temporarily to withdraw, suffering many casualties.

In a communiqué issued today, General MacArthur confirmed that "elements of alien Communist forces" have moved across the Yalu River into North Korea. Without identifying the new force as Chinese, General MacArthur branded this move as "one of the most offensive acts of international lawlessness of historic record." He also pointed out that this "new and fresh army" was "backed up by a possibility of large alien reserves," and added "whether and to what extent these reserves will be moved forward to reinforce units now committed remains to be seen and is a matter of the gravest international significance."[60] A press report from Tokyo states that about 300,000 trained troops are immediately available in Manchuria as reserves. An additional 300,000 are also reported to be available either in Manchuria or North China.

The probable objectives of Peking's intervention, as reported from Washington, are:

(1) to keep United Nations forces from the Chinese border;

(2) to delay as long as possible the settlement of the Korean affair by the United Nations;

(3) to involve United Nations, and particularly United States, troops in a campaign of attrition by prolonging the war into the winter, which is severe in North Korea, and possibly longer;

(4) to attempt to protect the extensive hydro-electric plants on the Yalu River which furnish power to Manchuria.

The question of Chinese Communist intervention in Korea will undoubtedly be raised in the Security Council as soon as General MacArthur's official report is officially received. (SECRET)

KOREA

Following for the Ambassador from the Minister, Begins: In this message I should like to confirm and expand the misgivings I expressed to you over the telephone this morning concerning MacArthur's communiqué on Chinese intervention in Korea.

2. You will recall that we were given the very definite impression, both here and in Washington, that when the United Nations forces were approaching the Chinese border, the United States would follow a very prudent and unprovocative course of action and that they were considering leaving a strip of no man's land between their forward positions and the border, so that the Government in Peking would have no excuse for committing their forces in North Korea. The events of the last week or so, obscure though they are in many respects, nevertheless seem clear enough to suggest that this policy of prudence has gone by the board. MacArthur appears to be regarding his assignment from a limited military point of view (except when he talks to the press) and apparently was determined to rout out the North Koreans from their final redoubts, even if that involved sending United States forces as far as the Yalu River. He may have been encouraged in this view by what seemed to be, until the last few days, the collapse of opposition in North Korea. They must surely be aware now in the State Department of the extremely serious risks of a war with China, and realize that their earlier confidence on this score doesn't seem to be justified.

3. The motives and intentions of the Peking Government are, of course, difficult to decipher. One likely reason, however, for their intervention is that they are afraid that the hydro-electric installations on the Yalu may be destroyed and that they have ordered their troops to cross the Korean frontier in order to protect them. If that is the case, an assurance from the United States authorities that these installations would not be damaged might produce a more moderate attitude in Peking. Such an assurance might conceivably be conveyed through the good offices of the Indians, though their present attitude of "we told you so" and also current developments in Tibet may make them reluctant to intervene. I realize, of course, that there are other possible interpretations of the Chinese intervention. But I feel strongly that nothing should be left undone which might help to remove the danger of conflict with China which could benefit no one but the Soviet Union.

4. In a matter of this gravity, it seems to me odd that MacArthur, when speaking specifically as the United Nations command, should comment on the Chinese position in the terms that he did and in the form of a communiqué to the press rather than in the form of a report to the United Nations. You will by now, I imagine, have expressed my surprise at this procedure to the State Department. Ends.

KOREAN SITUATION

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: Following our telephone conversation this morning I arranged to see Rusk with Ritchie in order to discuss the extent of Chinese intervention, MacArthur's statement of yesterday, and the action which might be taken in the Security Council. Since you spoke to me you have doubtless seen MacArthur's special report to the United Nations, received on Saturday afternoon, on the presence of Chinese military units, which will be the subject of the Security Council's meeting on Wednesday morning.

2. Rusk said that, according to this morning's report from Tokyo, about 26,000 Chinese Communist troops were believed to be in North Korea, together with about 47,000 remaining North Korean forces. The Chinese were organized in one complete division and in three curious formations made up of one battalion of peace preservation corps forced from each of the divisions now stationed in Manchuria. Against them there were in the North around 100,000 United Nations combat troops plus nearly 70,000 South Koreans, and further United Nations forces were moving North, which would raise the combat strength to 200,000 in all. In addition to the North Koreans still fighting in the North about 20,000 guerillas are at large in other parts of Korea, but these do not constitute a serious military problem at present.

3. He read us part of a paper listing eleven different motives as possibly prompting Chinese intervention, ranging from a desire to control a narrow belt of territory south of the Yalu River to a preliminary action in a general Soviet-planned offensive in other parts of the world. In his own judgment the likelihood is that the Chinese Communists intend to keep their intervention on a basis of limited liability. They would have to engage very substantial additional forces if their motive was to "liberate" all Korea or to re-establish the 38 parallel as a boundary. In any case, the intervention has not yet been on the scale alleged in a number of press reports, although it could be expanded easily, especially after the ground freezes and thus transport problems are simplified.

4. I told him that you were concerned over some of the language in MacArthur's statement, which could be regarded as leading towards an extension of air operations against Chinese installations and communications in Manchuria. He remarked that, although some of it was expressed "in Victorian language", it was in substance a mild reply to a very intense provocation. I said that the last paragraph, especially with its reference to the limitation of "our present mission" was disturbing, and asked him whether an enlargement of the mission to permit action in Manchuria was under consideration. He answered that this had not yet been considered, but, of course, continued and substantial Chinese reinforcements might make it necessary. He would express no view on how the United Nations mandate could be extended, saying he had not yet thought about this. The immediate purpose is to continue to endeavour to localize the fighting. I could not draw him out on the MacArthur statement. It bears the signs of his personal authorship, but I can form no firm opinion whether Washington was consulted in advance.

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: My immediately preceding message.

1. We asked Rusk what line the United States would take at Wednesday's meeting of the Security Council. He said that they had prepared a rough draft of a resolution and had begun consultation with the British on it after midnight last night. Finally he let me have a copy of the draft, asking me to ensure that this was kept secret from all members of the Security Council other than the United States. He said he would be very glad to have any comments from you. I therefore quote below the operative paragraphs of the resolution:

"INSISTENT THAT no action be taken which might lead to the spread of the Korean conflict to other areas and thereby further endanger international peace and security;

"CALLS UPON all States and authorities to refrain from assisting or encouraging the North Korean authorities, to prevent their nationals or individuals or units of their armed forces from giving assistance to North Korean forces and to cause the immediate withdrawal of any such nationals, individuals or units which may presently be in Korea;

"REQUESTS the United Nations Committee on Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea to hold itself available to assist in the settlement of any problems relating to conditions on the Korean frontier in which other States or authorities have an interest and to utilize such members of the Commission as now have representatives in the area for this purpose."

2. Rusk described this as a continued effort to bring about localization of the conflict. The last paragraph is intended as an indication to the Chinese that ways can be found to look after their interests in power from the Yalu dam and other frontier questions. There is no mention of the Communist Chinese in the preamble except that the Security Council would note the statements contained in MacArthur's special report of last Saturday. I think that the resolution is about as mild as one could reasonably expect in the circumstances.

3. Rusk said that he would welcome your views on how the issue should be handled and also any comments on the language of the resolution, which is certainly not in final form. He anticipates that it will be vetoed by the Soviet Union. As time is short, you might telephone your observations to me in the morning. Ends.

CHINESE INTERVENTION IN KOREA

Following from Heeney, Begins: Following are our preliminary reactions to the problems raised by the reported intervention in force by the Chinese Communists in Korea, and to MacArthur's statement on this subject which appeared in yesterday's press. We have not yet seen the text of MacArthur's special report to the United Nations.[61]

2. It is slightly reassuring to note that MacArthur ends his communiqué with the affirmation that "our present mission is limited to the destruction of those forces now arrayed against us in North Korea," and that he refers to the "alien reserves" and "supply" as being "beyond the limits of our present sphere of military action". The implication is strong, however, that MacArthur may be setting the stage for action against the Chinese bases of troops and supply in Manchuria. For this reason we were pleased to note Rusk's statement to Wrong, as reported in Washington teletype No. 41 of November 6, to you, repeated to us as WA-2851 of November 6, that the immediate purpose is to continue to endeavour to localize the fighting.

3. Our primary objective should be to afford time for the Chinese Communists to disengage and withdraw from Korea, if this can be brought about. While the existing Security Council resolution on the restoration of peace and security "in the area" might be construed as giving sufficient authority for limited military action across the border to safeguard U.N. positions, we think it would be politically wise to avoid the necessity of taking advantage of this interpretation for the time being by stopping short of the frontier in the military advance. This would, of course, have to be consistent with military necessity and the reasonable safety of U.N. forces. On the broader issue of retaliatory strikes against Chinese bases in the rear, we should insist that such action is not covered by the present resolution, and would require further authorization from the United Nations. The main objective to keep in mind at this stage, in our opinion, is that nothing should be done on grounds of military expediency to prejudice eventual decisions which are of the highest political importance. Assuming that the United States authorities are in general agreement with this view, we should hope that appropriate advice could be sent to General MacArthur if this has not already been done. Such advice should cover the activities of ROK forces, in case there is still any doubt in MacArthur's mind regarding his responsibility for their military operations.

4. I agree with the United Kingdom view (C.R.O. telegram Y.329 of November 4)† that there is everything to be said politically for not forcing the Chinese into a position where they cannot withdraw. I should go further, however, and would hope that positive steps could be taken to provide an opportunity for withdrawal before any action is taken by the Security Council or the General Assembly. If Chinese motives are primarily their concern over the hydro-electric installations along the Yalu River and over the physical presence of troops other than South Koreans along the border itself, appropriate assurances might be conveyed through the Indians or through other channels to the effect that (a) there is no intention of destroying the Yalu power installations and (b) arrangements will be made in consultation with the interested Korean and Chinese authorities to distribute electric power from these installations on an equitable basis. The approach might be made, after consultation with the Unified Command, by the President of the Interim Committee on Korea, if UNCURK itself is not yet in a position to act.

5. Should such preliminary moves not be feasible, and the immediate introduction of a resolution of some sort be considered necessary, the tentative United States draft outlined in Mr. Wrong's WA-2852 of November 6 seems to afford a reasonable and realistic approach. I should be inclined to strengthen the third operative paragraph ("Requests the United Nations Committee" etc.) with a more specific assurance that the interests of other states or authorities in problems relating to the frontier will be safeguarded, and that such other states and authorities would be consulted. This would incorporate more of the United Kingdom suggestions as contained in C.R.O. Y.330 of November 4.† I also assume that the preparatory paragraphs of any resolution would re-affirm United Nations objectives in Korea, making it clear that these are in no way prejudicial to the interests of any other state.

6. With reference to the question of Chinese motivation, while the present intervention merely makes good the warning that the People's Government could not stand idly by if United States forces crossed the 38th parallel, and may be related to the limited objective of safeguarding Manchuria's power supply, it is hard to understand military action on this apparent scale at this late date unless Peiping is convinced either that the occupation of all Korea constitutes a serious and continuing military threat or that the third world war is not only inevitable but imminent. If the latter, the Chinese Communists could be basing their estimate on a belief that war will be initiated by the West, or on knowledge that it is the intention of the U.S.S.R. to force the pace and precipitate the major conflict. In either case, however, the Chinese seem to be deliberately running the risk of having their major centres bombed in return for creating a situation which would, in a military sense, be of more benefit to the U.S.S.R. than to China, since China would suffer the initial loss in the process of facilitating the Soviet military task in Europe.

7. The only other conclusion would appear to be that the Chinese Communists, while realizing the risk, are counting on Soviet backing should the area of hostilities be extended by the United Nations forces to China proper, and are relying on this as an effective deterrent to the United Nations authorizing or condoning such an extension. In this event their intention would presumably be to restrict their intervention to a limited sphere in North Korea, and they might be persuaded to withdraw if suitable conditions could be established for the solution of border problems in which they consider themselves to have a vital interest. Ends.

KOREA

Officials of the State Department concerned with Korean affairs, reviewing situation today, said that the gradual Communist withdrawal in Korea seems to be continuing. Communist forces appear to be regrouping in concentration in the Kang-Gye region, in the general region 41 degrees latitude North, 126 degrees 30 minutes longitude East, which has been throughout one of their main staging-areas. It is interesting to observe that this is not close to the location of the Yalu hydro-electric plant. It is now thought possible that the intention of the Communist command may be to form a tough defensive perimeter in the rugged Kang-Gye region in an attempt to prolong the campaign through the winter months.

2. Asked for comment on the reported statement from General MacArthur's headquarters that sixty thousand Chinese Communist troops are now in Korea, State Department officials said they had no definite information that there had been a substantial increase in the total number of Chinese Communist troops in Korea within the last forty-eight hours. They think that re-enforcements are continuing to cross the border.

3. Air activity has been sustained with heavy bombing of the Communist supply lines and bridgeheads on the border. State Department officials continue to emphasize the difficulties of the United Nations air forces having to operate against fighter planes taking off from and returning to Chinese air fields.

4. The State Department informed us that as of this morning no request for United States visas had been received from Chinese Communist delegations named to proceed to the United Nations. Authority for the issue of the necessary visas has been given.

5. The State Department is continuing to maintain the same level-headed position which was displayed during my conversations with Messrs. Acheson and Rusk earlier this week, despite the intense nature of the provocation caused by continuing movements into Korea of Chinese Communist forces and by the employment of aircraft from their safe haven on the other side of the Yalu River. The strong public feeling on this issue is likely to increase, especially if, after the present pause, heavy ground fighting begins again. The State Department, however, fully recognize the need for doing their best to localize Chinese intervention and to keep it on the basis of limited liability.

CUBA, ECUADOR, FRANCE, NORWAY, THE UNITED KINGDOM AND THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA: JOINT DRAFT RESOLUTION

The Security Council

RECALLING its resolution of 25th June 1950, determining that the North Korean forces had committed a breach of the peace and calling upon all members of the United Nations to refrain from giving assistance to the North Korean authorities,.

RECALLING the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on 7th October 1950,[62] which sets forth the policies of the United Nations in respect to Korea,

HAVING NOTED from the special report of the United Nations Command in Korea dated 5th November 1950 that Chinese Communist military units are deployed for action against the forces of the United Nations in Korea,

AFFIRMING that United Nations forces should not remain in any part of Korea otherwise than so far as necessary for achieving the objectives of stability throughout Korea and the establishment of a unified independent and democratic Government in the sovereign state of Korea, as set forth in the resolution of the General Assembly dated 7th October 1950,

INSISTENT that no action be taken which might lead to the spread of the Korean conflict to other areas and thereby further endanger international peace and security,

CALLS UPON all states and authorities, and in particular those responsible for the action noted above, to refrain from assisting or encouraging the North Korean authorities, to prevent their nationals or individuals or units of their armed forces from giving assistance to North Korean forces and to cause the immediate withdrawal of any such nationals, individuals, or units which may presently be in Korea;

AFFIRMS that it is the policy of the United Nations to hold the Chinese frontier with Korea inviolate and fully to protect legitimate Chinese and Korean interests in the frontier zone;

CALLS ATTENTION to the grave danger which continued intervention by Chinese forces in Korea would entail for the maintenance of such a policy;

REQUESTS the Interim Committee on Korea and the United Nations Commission on the unification and rehabilitation of Korea to consider urgently and to assist in the settlement of any problems relating to conditions on the Korean frontier in which states or authorities on the other side of the frontier have an interest, and suggests that the United Nations Commission on the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea proceed to the area as soon as possible, and, pending its arrival that it utilize such members of the Commissions as now have representatives in the area for this purpose. CHINESE INTERVENTION IN KOREA

1. We fear that in the present atmosphere of haste and emotion, there is grave danger that decisions, all of which involve calculated risks, may be made without taking full account of the main considerations of policy, which would seem to us to be the following:

(1) The purpose of the resistance to the aggression of North Korea was to demonstrate that aggression does not pay. Aggression will, however, pay most substantial dividends to the Cominform bloc if it leads to a war between the United States and China.

(2) The interest of the Western democratic powers is to limit hostilities in the Korean area and to have hostilities come to an end as quickly as possible in order that stability may be restored and foreign troops withdrawn.

(3) It would also seem to be in the interest of the Chinese to limit hostilities in order that they may get ahead with the job of reconstructing China.

(4) The only country whose interest would be served by an extension of hostilities in the Korean area is the Soviet Union.

(5) When the Western democratic powers are as weak in land forces as they are today, they must play for time in which to get stronger.

(6) The main front is Western Europe and we must resist efforts of the Soviet Union to get us committed to a theatre of secondary importance.

(7) If a war with China should break out, it is of the utmost importance that public opinion throughout the world, not only in North America but in Western Europe and in the democratic states of Asia, should be convinced that the United States and its partners have done everything they possibly could to avoid war. The record must clearly show this. It must not, for example, show that decisions were arrived at in haste and that the Chinese, either as witnesses, or defendants, or parties at interest, were not given their day in court.

(8) In dealing with the Chinese we must take full account of the possibility that their suspicions of the intent of the United States to encircle them have been genuinely aroused because, for example, of actions in Formosa, General MacArthur's statements, and the refusal to admit them to the United Nations. The increased influence of violently anti-Chinese-Communist elements in the Republican party which may be expected as the result of the recent elections will not help to allay these suspicions.

2. The Chinese have indicated that at least one of their purposes in intervening in North Korea is to protect the electric power installations upon which their important industrial base in South Manchuria so largely depends. It would be advisable at this stage to work on the assumption that this is a primary Chinese objective, and to make every effort to find a reasonable solution of this aspect of the problem, if only to place the United Nations in a position of having given proper consideration to what would appear to be a legitimate Chinese interest.

3. In view of all this, the first approach to the problem should surely be to seek to reassure the Chinese regarding the purposes and implications of United Nations action in Korea and to smoke out their real motives before taking steps which may serve only to enlarge their original intentions. This should be done through every available channel, for example, the Korean Commission, through the Security Council, through statements by the United States, and through statements conveyed by India in Peking.

4. If this approach fails, then we can give consideration to taking the risk of stressing intimidation rather than reassurance.

5. My immediately following teletype contains suggestions as to what might be done, in practical terms, in the light of the above. Would you discuss these suggestions with such other delegations as you think appropriate, including the French, whom we note from yesterday's New York Times have received somewhat similar instructions.

6. As I indicated to LePan on the telephone from Toronto this morning, since Canada is not a member of either the Security Council or the Interim Committee, it is not (repeat not) our intention to advance any proposals. However, I would like you to discuss our views and our suggestions as indicated in these two messages with Keith Officer and perhaps Romulo (Interim Committee) and Jebb, the Indians and the French (Security Council). For the present I do not (repeat not) wish you to take these matters up further with the U.S. Delegation.

Following for Riddell, Begins: My No. 267 of November 11. Chinese Intervention in Korea.

2. In view of the certainty that the draft resolution quoted in your 337 of Nov. 8†[63] will be vetoed in the Security Council, and since we have grave doubts as to whether the increasing U.S. tendency to adopt an attitude of intimidation noted in your 351 of Nov. 9,† will produce the desired reaction from the Chinese Communists, we have been giving thought to the possibility of a somewhat different line of approach being tried concurrently, which might serve more effectively to test Chinese intentions and produce immediate results.

3. What we have in mind could be in the form of a recommendation from the Interim Committee on Korea to the Security Council. This recommendation could refer to Romulo's resolution, which was passed yesterday, deciding that in view of the urgency of the problem representatives of the members of the Committee who are in Korea will lend all practicable assistance in respect of questions relating to the Northern Korean frontier. It might then go on to note the difficulties of rendering any practical assistance in the midst of hostilities, and the danger to the hydroelectric installations along the frontier if hostilities continue. It might emphasize the importance of these installations to both China and Korea. It would then recommend to the Security Council that it call upon North Korean forces, to cease hostilities in the vicinity of these installations, and to afford facilities for U.N. representatives to visit the areas involved in order to discuss with representatives of states or authorities having interests in these installations appropriate measures for safeguarding them and settling problems arising from the distribution of electrical power in the area.

4. You will note that this is directed to a cease fire in the vicinity of the hydroelectric installations only, and is therefore a more modest proposal than a temporary truce along the whole front. It would assume, of course, that if this proposal were accepted by the North Koreans, U.N. forces would likewise cease hostilities in this area to enable negotiations to proceed. This would create a temporarily neutralized zone.

5. The object of such a recommendation would be to provide some basis on which there might be a possibility of agreement in the Security Council and which would deal with the immediate issue while avoiding direct reference to the more controversial aspects of the problem. In this form it could appropriately come from the Interim Committee without the implication that the sponsors of the (U.S.) draft resolution are backing down on the broader issue of intervention, since the Committee is legitimately interested in rehabilitation and the effects on this of the destruction of the Yalu plants.

6. If anything is to be done in the Security Council, action would have to be taken quickly, since it would appear advisable to have the recommendation before the

7. In addition, the Interim Committee might also consider following up yesterday's resolution with a request to the Secretary General that he make Col. Katzin available to meet with representatives of the Peking Government, perhaps in Hong Kong, to discuss practical problems connected with the Yalu power plants.

Your telegrams No. 267 and No. 268 of November 11th — Korea.

Since the receipt of message from the Department on Friday, I have discussed Security Council action on Chinese penetration in Korea with members of Secretary General's office, United Kingdom, United States, Indian and French delegations. In each case I have tried to discover extent to which policy as expressed in resolution tabled on Friday commanded support, and I also enquired if any separate approach were being made to Chinese Communists with a view to discovering whether Chinese objectives in crossing Yalu River were limited ones that could be satisfied by process of negotiation.

2. In regard to resolution now before Security Council, draft in present form apparently carries full concurrence of all its sponsors. Seventh paragraph, affirming inviolability of Chinese frontier, was put in on insistence of French. Once it had been put in, however, U.S.A. and United Kingdom insisted on adding eighth paragraph as a warning that if Chinese intervention continued, Yalu River would be crossed, by aircraft at least, to break up Chinese concentrations and supply bases in Manchuria. Both Ross and Jebb insisted that without this warning, United Nations commander might have been prevented by resolution from taking necessary military action beyond the Yalu River. Lacoste of French delegation assured me that his delegation did not contemplate resolution in terms apparently suggested by Friday's press, and seemed perplexed by my account of the report, which he had not seen. I did not see it either, and it may have appeared only in early editions of the Times, which reach Ottawa.

3. Undertaking given in paragraph 7 of this draft resolution, and in statements in Security Council, that Chinese interests will be protected are regarded by sponsors as adequate assurance to Chinese, who are supposed to take this resolution seriously and withdraw their forces or take the consequences. If this resolution is vetoed in the Security Council, or if, for some other reason, progress on it cannot be made, it is intention of United States delegation to carry the question to the Assembly at once. Jebb admitted that neither the text of the draft resolution nor the supporting statements might have this effect of carrying any great weight of assurance of confidence to Chinese Communists, but he was at a loss to know what else could be done. He remarked that he kept doing his best to give a moderate line to the debate, but that his efforts were always offset by the menacing language used by the Senator.

4. As far as I can find out, no serious effort is being made to establish contact with the Chinese Communists, except by inviting (or summoning) them to the Security Council. Jebb agreed that it was essential to make contact with them, but thought this could only be done if they came to Lake Success. He was uncertain what should be done in view of their refusal to permit their delegation to discuss Korea. Cordier hinted that some effort was being made to find out from Peiping what the Chinese objectives in Korea were, but I could get no confirmation of this hint. Indians say they have had nothing new from Panniker for a fortnight, and, if instructions have gone to him to discuss Korea in Peiping, the delegation does not know of it.

5. In my conversation with Ross of United States delegation, I asked whether consideration had been given to sending someone of the character of Bunche to get in touch with Peiping, with the authority to state that existence of Chinese interests in Yalu River area was recognized and that he was prepared to discuss methods of protecting them. I reminded Ross that Bernadotte had not been able to begin his negotiations on truce agreements in Palestine until he simply announced that he was coming to various capitals in area and requested safe conduct for his plane. Ross agreed that only assurance Chinese had that their interests would be protected lay in public statements of Acheson and Austin, and that no effort had been made to put these assurances in more concrete form. He seemed interested in the idea that, even in advance of decision being taken on Security Council resolution, effort might be made to send someone to work out a truce with Chinese. I could not, however, get any response to this idea from either Jebb or Lacoste. Nor were any of them prepared to contemplate, at this moment, an alternative or supplementary resolution in the Security Council calling for a cease-fire in border area. They all considered that a cease-fire which did not set up machinery to make sure that no more Chinese troops crossed river and which did not also require withdrawal of Chinese troops already in Korea, would be greatly to advantage of Chinese and would never be accepted by military authorities.

Following from Riddell, Begins: Present intention is that discussion on Korea shall be renewed when Security Council meets on Thursday afternoon, but simply for the purpose of hearing three speakers who are already on the list. When these speakers have been heard, Palestine item will be resumed. No effort will be made to reach a vote on the Korean resolution before the Security Council on Thursday, and discussion will not be resumed until next week, possibly Tuesday. It is hoped by that time that Peiping representatives will have reached New York and that they may be persuaded to appear in the Security Council to discuss Korean item.

2. United Kingdom delegation has sent urgently to London for assistance from someone who speaks type of Chinese which is thought to be speech of delegates and, if possible, who has had some contact with them. There is some apprehension here that Chinese delegates will merely make formal appearances at meetings, and that personal or informal contact with them will be difficult.

3. I have canvassed suggestions contained in Department's telegrams No. 267 and No. 268 of November 11th with all delegations mentioned except Philippines. I have not spoken to Romulo because it does not seem to be worthwhile taking the very great risk of having him relay the conversation to the press as is his habit. None of the other delegations consulted consider that circumstances here at the moment provide an appropriate setting for a proposal of the kind suggested in your telegram No. 267. Ends.

Aide Mémoire des États-Unis

United States Aide Mémoire

[Ottawa], November 14, 1950

The United Nations forces in Korea are confronted with a grave problem in the use of Manchurian territory as a privileged sanctuary for enemy forces which are in fact attacking United Nations forces in Korea itself.

This problem arises in two respects. First, ground forces can move into Korea and supply themselves from bases and lines of communication which are largely sheltered by the immunity of Manchurian territory. Secondly, aircraft, the nationality of which is not always known, operate from Manchurian fields, dash into Korean air space to strike at United Nations air and ground forces and then fly to safety behind the Manchurian border a very few minutes away.

The United Nations Commander has the strictest orders about violations of Manchurian territory as well as orders to use extreme care in operations near the frontier itself to insure that hostilities are restricted to Korea. This determination to abide by the rules imposes a most serious handicap in the face of a enemy willing not only to break the rules but to exploit the proper conduct of the United Nations forces.

The United States Government is determined for its part to do everything possible to localize the conflict in Korea. This is illustrated by the rigorous instructions to its commanders in the field as well as by efforts made to adjust accidental intrusions into Chinese territory by offering compensation for damages, etc. It is obvious, however, that the abuse of Manchurian territory by the enemy could easily impose an intolerable burden upon the United Nations forces operating lawfully and properly on United Nations missions in Korea. Therefore the United States Government wishes to inform the Government of Canada that it may become necessary at an early date for United Nations aircraft to be allowed to defend themselves in the air space over the Yalu River to the extent of permitting hot pursuit of attacking enemy aircraft up to two or three minutes flying time into Manchurian air space. It is contemplated that United Nations aircraft would limit themselves to repelling enemy aircraft engaged in offensive missions into Korea. The United States Government believes this would be a minimum reaction to extreme provocation, would not itself affect adversely the attitude of the enemy toward Korean operations, would serve as a warning, and would add greatly to the morale of United Nations pilots who are now prevented from taking even minimum defense measures and for whom in the case of bomber pilots it is impossible under existing conditions to provide adequate air cover.

Government also agrees that the abuse of Manchurian territory by the enemy could impose an intolerable burden upon the United Nations forces operating lawfully and properly on United Nations missions in Korea.

2. The immediate question is whether the burden has now become, or is likely shortly to become, so intolerable as to make it necessary for United Nations aircraft to pursue attacking enemy aircraft up to two or three minutes flying time into Manchurian air space. The answer to this question involves, of course, the careful balancing of purely military considerations against the political consideration that combat operations in Manchurian air space will increase the risk of the extension of hostilities.

3. In order to lessen the risk that the step which the United States Government has proposed would lead to an extension of hostilities and in order to give the Chinese Communists an opportunity to discontinue the present abuse of Manchurian air space by hostile aircraft, the Canadian Government considers it important that, before the United Nations Commander-in-Chief is instructed to permit pursuit, the Chinese Communist Government should be given notice in appropriate terms, preferably by a representative of the Unified Command in the Security Council, that, if hostile aircraft continue to use Manchurian air space, United Nations aircraft will naturally have to defend themselves in the air space over the Yalu River to the extent of pursuing attacking enemy aircraft.

4. Such a notice might also help us to determine the real intentions of the Chinese Communists. If they take measures to stop the use of their air space by hostile aircraft, this will to some extent indicate a desire to limit the conflict on their Korean border.

5. It might also be useful if a representative of the United Nations could establish direct contact with representatives of the Chinese Communist Government with a view to discussing border problems arising out of the present situation in North Korea.

6. It would therefore seem to the Canadian Government to be wise to delay a decision whether or not United Nations aircraft should be authorized to pursue hostile aircraft into Manchurian air space until reasonable time has been given for the Chinese Communist Government to show whether or not they intend to heed this warning notice.

7. In spite of the case which could be made under international law that the United Nations Commander-in-Chief has the right to authorize United Nations aircraft to pursue attacking aircraft into Manchurian air space, the Canadian Government considers it most important that no military operations take place outside Korean borders without specific authority from the United Nations.

Memorandum from Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], November 14, 1950

KOREA: U.S. AIDE MÉMOIRE OF NOVEMBER 14

Mr. Wrong telephoned me from Washington at 3:45 to state that he had taken the matter up with Mr. Hickerson of the State Department.

2. Hickerson explained that we were one of five or six countries which had received the aide mémoire along with a request for our observations. The United States Ambassadors at these five or six posts were instructed, however, that they were to make it clear that they were not asking for concurrence in the proposed course of action. A number of other posts were instructed to give the information in the aide mémoire to the local foreign office but not to seek their observations.

3. The United States does not intend to take the matter to the Security Council. The United States argument is that the power to permit hot pursuit is based upon admitted rules of international law. They further emphasize that it is essential that they maintain air superiority over the border.

4. Mr. Hickerson insists that this policy of hot pursuit should not be interpreted as a step towards anything else, such as the bombing of airfields in Manchuria.

5. Mr. Hickerson is inclined to think that General MacArthur has not yet been instructed that he has authority to permit hot pursuit.

6. When Mr. Hickerson was informed by Mr. Wrong that Mr. Gross of the United States Delegation in New York had said last week that General MacArthur could not take any measures outside the Korean borders without specific United Nations authority, Mr. Hickerson said that this was not the view of the United States. In the view of the United States, the only limitation on General MacArthur was the one contained in the original Security Council resolution, which refers to the Korean area.

7. I said that, if this was the line taken by the United States, then General MacArthur or the United States Government presumably had the right to authorize the bombing of airfields in Manchuria. Mr. Wrong agreed. When I went on to say that this argument could also be pushed to mean that he had authority to bomb Peiping, Mr. Wrong disagreed.

8. I told Mr. Wrong that I had had a chance to mention to Mr. Pearson that we would be telephoning him later this afternoon on this question after we have had a chance to consult with Mr. Wrong and with Mr. Riddell. I said that Mr. Pearson's immediate reaction was that there should be no hot pursuit until the Communist Chinese had been warned that, if hostile planes continue to use Chinese air space, the United Nations Commander-in-Chief would have to permit hot pursuit. Mr.

Pearson added that this warning should preferably be given through the United Nations.

9. Mr. Wrong was not impressed by the advisability of our saying this to the United States. I added that he would shortly be receiving from us a repetition of a telegram† from London which they had asked us to treat with great discretion, stating that the British, like us, were also pressing the idea of the creation of a neutral buffer zone. I added that the creation of such a zone might be made more difficult if, in the meantime, air operations were authorized in Chinese air space.

(C.F. Heads of Divisions Meeting No. 46 of November 13, 1950).

48. Mr. Collins. A United States Army spokesman reported on November 17 that identified movements of Chinese forces into Korea have slackened, although there may have been unreported movements at night. The Chinese in Korea have insufficient heavy equipment for offensive operations, although they might conduct a fairly protracted holding campaign. The lull in active fighting is continuing and the military purpose of the Chinese intervention remains obscure.

49. There has been no further debate in the Security Council on the resolution calling on the Chinese Communists to withdraw their nationals. In a speech at Windsor, Mr. Pearson, referring to the dangers of hostilities spreading beyond Korea as a result of Chinese intervention, declared that the Korean fighting should be "confined and localized". If that is not possible, the policy "should avoid giving anyone else an excuse for extending it".

50. The United Kingdom has proposed to the State Department the establishment of a demilitarized area along the Manchurian border from which all foreign forces would be withdrawn.

51. During the week both Mr. Acheson and Mr. Truman publicly reassured Peking that the United States and the United Nations have no ulterior designs in Manchuria. The Peking Government, however, in a note to the United Nations declared their aid to North Korea was, "natural, just, magnanimous and lawful", because it was designed to repel "American aggression", and unless the United States withdrew its troops from Korea, the Chinese struggle "would never cease". Meanwhile, Mr. Panikkar reported that the Soviet representative in Peking told him that if the United States bomb Manchurian bases, the Soviet airforce would go into action. (SECRET)

1. You will have noted the suggestion in telegram No. 414 of November 18† from Paris that the French authorities would consider it helpful if we were to lend our assistance to the representations being made in Washington by the British and French on the subject of a demilitarized zone in North Korea.

2. We have, of course, made our general views known in connection with our own earlier suggestion regarding the possibility of establishing limited demilitarized areas around the hydro-electric installations. It might be useful, however, if you could find the opportunity to discuss with the State Department the feasibility of the more recent scheme for a neutralized strip along the entire border, indicating our support for some arrangement along these lines. Now that United Nations forces have actually reached the border, the United Nations is in a better bargaining position for negotiations with the Chinese Communists since withdrawal of the United Nations forces could be made contingent upon a similar withdrawal across the border of the Chinese now in Korea. Moreover, the offer of such withdrawal on the part of the United Nations would serve as concrete evidence of the lack of hostile intentions as far as China is concerned.

1. When seeing Rusk on Formosa today I asked him for the latest information on some of the issues respecting Korea.

2. With regard to the "hot pursuit" proposal (which he said should be more correctly called the application of the principle of self-defence), he said that everyone in the State Department shared the apprehensions over the possible consequences expressed by the Canadian and other Governments which had made observations. The proposal would only be brought into effect in the event of serious military necessity. The main concern was that the complete air supremacy of the United Nations forces had resulted in an almost total absence of air defences behind the United Nations lines. Roads were jammed and supply depots exposed to air attack. If there were large-scale bombing operations from Manchuria against these lines, the military results could be very serious if air-fighting continued to be limited to Korean air-space only. There had, however, been little air activity from Manchuria for a week or more, and he hoped that the need to apply the proposal would not arise. He remarked that if the need did arise it would be impossible to justify a delay until specific authority could be given by the United Nations.

3. On the British suggestion for a demilitarized zone he said that it would prolong the agony in Korea if the very large no man's land suggested by the British were to be accepted and would create a number of difficult problems of administration and pacification. It also was quite out of the question to give the Peking Government by agreement a measure of authority in any Korean territory. They did not, however, dismiss the idea of a narrow zone along the Yalu River from the point already reached by United States forces down to the mouth. The best defensive line in that area is the high ridge some ten miles back from the river, which commands the river valley. An offensive by United Nations forces is imminent, and if it can reach this ridge the main positions would be established there and the area up to the river would be covered only by patrols, possibly of South Koreans. The intention was that substantial formations of United Nations forces should not be stationed along the south bank of the river.

4. He also said in this connection that the present military intention was not to seek to penetrate into the north-eastern province adjacent to the Soviet frontier. The highest mountains and most difficult country in Korea lie between the present United States position on the Yalu and the sea of Japan to the south-east. Both military and political considerations therefore pointed to the establishment of a defensive line in this area a long way back from the Soviet frontier.

5. I asked him about negotiations with the Chinese. He said that there would be no lack of people seeking to establish contact with the delegation to Lake Success on its arrival. The United States would be willing to talk to them but would not seek a direct contact themselves. He thought it best to leave it to the British and others to explore the possibilities. I mentioned to him that Lie was prepared to make Bunche available as a negotiator with Peking. He only remarked that there seemed to be a sufficient number of candidates.

6. He confirmed that it is their intention to proceed with the Korean resolution in the Security Council perhaps in a week or two.

Your EX-2383 of November 22nd. Korea.

1. This message crossed the report included in my WA-3025 of November 22nd of my talk with Dean Rusk on the same subject. When I opened with Rusk the question of a possible demilitarized zone, I told him that the suggestion had aroused interest in Ottawa and that the Canadian Government hoped that something would come of it. I think it unnecessary to make a further approach to the Department of State in view of my conversation with him and also in view of the opening on Thursday of a major offensive by the United Nations forces. It is clear to me that it would be fruitless to push the proposal in the terms originally put forward by the British, as this would require a cessation of operations which are now under way with the object of establishing a defensive line in the high ground south of the Yalu River and thence to the Sea of Japan. If the operations succeed, something might be done with respect to the area between this defensive line and the actual frontier, although I do not believe that support could be secured for "neutralizing" the area between the frontier and the United Nations positions. Possibly some early demilitarization measures in this area might be acceptable.

2. On the question of hot pursuit, I indicated in my WA-3025 that in Rusk's view the United States suggestion should have been based on the international doctrine of self-defence or justified reprisal rather than on the doctrine of hot pursuit. He remarked that when the message putting forward the suggestion was drafted their experts in international law happened to be absent from Washington, but they had now studied the question and have considered that there would be justification in international law for trespassing in Manchurian air-space in the circumstances described by him, as a necessary means of self-defence. You will have noted that Rusk described the circumstances in which such trespass might become necessary in more restrictive terms than had been used in previous discussions with the State Department.

3. It is certainly the hope and desire of Mr. Acheson and other responsible senior officials that there should be no military action in or over Manchurian territory. It is also their hope and desire that the United Nations forces should not immediately face Chinese forces across the Yalu River, although they consider military victory must be secured over the remaining hostile forces in Korean territory. If the present offensive succeeds rapidly, there may be some prospect of arranging for a demilitarized zone of greater depth than the strip between the Yalu and the mountain barriers along its course. That must depend, of course, in part on the Chinese reaction to the victory which the Unified Command expects to win promptly.

4. In your EX-2383 reference is made both to "a demilitarized zone" and to "a neutralized strip". Am I correct in assuming that the adjectives were used interchangeably? The establishment of a neutralized area would seem to necessitate the assumption in it by the United Nations of responsibility for civil administration, possibly for an indefinite period.

KOREA; PRESENT POSITION

11. The Minister of National Defence said that recent reports indicated that 200,000 Chinese Communist troops and 41,000 North Koreans were now actively engaged against U.N. forces of a ground combat strength of about 260,000. The powerful enemy counter-attack had caused a general withdrawal in the western and central fronts. Air observations indicated a continuous stream of enemy troops moving southward toward the right sector of the U.N. western positions.

General MacArthur had reported that all hope of confining the Korean conflict to enemy forces composed of North Korean troops could now be abandoned and the general situation was regarded as extremely grave.

12. Mr. Claxton pointed out that, while initially Chinese Communist intention might have been merely to safeguard Chinese interests in Manchuria and to exert pressure on the United Nations to obtain other concessions, if the reported scale of present Communist Chinese action were to be accepted, it would indicate that the latter's intentions were more aggressive and might indicate a resolve to drive U.N. forces from the whole of Korea.

The extent to which Chinese Communist action in the area had been dictated by the Soviet Union was not clear but in any event these actions had received Soviet support and had served the interests of the Soviet Union in Asia and in the West in that the continued containment of U.N. forces in Korea would delay the setting up of an integrated force in Europe and leave the Soviet Union a free hand in the rest of the world. The Soviet Union might continue to support Chinese Communists in Korea by all methods short of direct military participation or, on the other hand, might use any violation of Chinese Communist territory by the U.N. forces as an occasion for direct military intervention. U.N. forces might be able to hold defensive positions for a reasonable time, but should Communist forces be substantially reinforced by reserves now available in Manchuria and North China, the U.N. position could become untenable.

For the second time since the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, U.S. military intelligence had shown an almost complete failure to anticipate events. General MacArthur had taken the view all along that there was no possibility of Communist China intervening. Now that it had done so, he appeared to be asking permission for U.N. troops to cross the Manchurian border with the possibility of full scale warfare with China and potentially disastrous results. His belief that Communist China would not intervene seemed to have been based to a large extent on his conviction that the air forces at his disposal were capable of destroying major Chinese cities by conventional bombing methods. Consequently, pressure for this kind of action might well be anticipated.

13. The Secretary of State for External Affairs agreed that the U.N. command had failed to anticipate Chinese intentions or to take into account the effect of its policies on such intentions.

It was recalled that, on a number of occasions both in Washington and the United Nations, Canada had expressed concern over the possibilities of reckless action in Korea and had done whatever possible to discourage aggressive or provocative moves in an attempt to confine the extent of hostilities. All information received up to the launching of the Chinese attack indicated that General MacArthur had regarded his recent offensive as a mopping-up operation. The Canadian Ambassador in Washington had reported that the large scale Chinese offensive came as a complete surprise to the State Department and presumably to the Pentagon as well. Indications were that the reference to the United Nations in the final paragraph of MacArthur's communiqué was not discussed with the State Department in advance and probably was inserted by him on his own authority. It did not appear that he had yet requested permission to bomb Manchurian territory. Unless there was a great military disaster, a winter campaign now seemed to be inevitable, with probable appeals for the dispatch of further troops.

The Canadian Ambassador to the United States had reported that Senator Austin had been authorized from Washington to make a charge of "open and notorious aggression" against the Peking Government in the Security Council yesterday. The present U.S. intention appeared to be to press for a vote on the Korean resolution already before the Security Council, calling on all states and authorities to cease giving assistance to the North Korean forces and to withdraw any of their nationals or units, rather than to introduce a new resolution.

(Telegram WA-3058, Canadian Ambassador to the United States, Nov. 28, 1950)†

It could be assumed that this resolution would be vetoed by Russia. The matter in all probability would then be referred to the Assembly which might be asked by the United States or some other delegation to declare Communist China an aggressor and to recommend the taking of appropriate action.

14. Mr. Pearson said Canada had now to consider what could be done to assist in a satisfactory solution and prevent the outbreak of a general war with Communist China.

The resolution at present before the Security Council provided a good possible basis for initial action. Since the United States had now charged Communist China with aggression in Korea and since the latter had denied government action to send troops into Korea, the resolution might be amended to instruct the U.N. Commission on Korea to make an on-the-spot investigation of the situation and to call on the Council to order a cease-fire in order to make such an investigation possible. If the six-power resolution, as amended, was vetoed in the Security Council, it could be introduced in the First Political Committee of the Assembly. Meanwhile, discussions might proceed in private with the Chinese Communist representatives in New York and possibly at the same time through Mr. Nehru in New Delhi or his representative in Peking. Another course might be to send a U.N. committee to China to negotiate with representatives of the People's Government. Initially, an attempt might be made to secure agreement to proposals along the general lines made by the United Kingdom two weeks ago for the creation of a demilitarized area north of what is known as the waist of Korea. The U.N. forces might have to retire to this line for strategic reasons. If they could re-group themselves without retiring to this line, then the United Nations would be in a better bargaining position with the Chinese since withdrawal to the proposed line could be made a quid pro quo for Chinese Communist withdrawal from North Korea.

The main objective should be to get at least a de facto cease-fire in order to create an atmosphere in which private negotiations might have the best chance for success.

It was most desirable to delay any formal decision by the General Assembly as, once an aggressor was labelled, the door would be closed to a settlement or even an attempt at a settlement. If all efforts towards this end should fail, then consideration would have to be given to what further action could be taken.

It would be extremely dangerous if the United States tried to force the United Nations to authorize military operations which they were at present incapable of bringing to a successful conclusion. It would be equally dangerous if the United States felt compelled to take action on its own, or, conversely, if a number of member nations divorced themselves from decisions taken by the United Nations.

(External Affairs memorandum and attachments, Nov. 29, 1950)†

15. The Prime Minister suggested that, if a U.N. committee were sent to Communist China to negotiate, this would constitute de facto recognition of the Peking Government.

16. Mr. Pearson pointed out that de facto recognition had already been granted in inviting a Chinese Communist delegation to attend for discussions.

17. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the reports of the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the military and international situation arising out of recent events in Korea.

CHINESE INTERVENTION IN KOREA

Following from Under-Secretary, Begins: The following are the main points in a memorandum† put to the Minister this morning which now has his general agreement and that of the Prime Minister. This for the present is for your own information only.

(1) The 6-power resolution now before the Security Council provides the best basis for initial action. We hope there may be an opportunity in the near future for the United Kingdom to bring forward publicly, perhaps in the Assembly, their proposal for a demilitarized zone. Even without a public statement on this question every effort should continue to be made to have private discussions with the Chinese Communist representatives in New York in an endeavour to secure their agreement to some eventual solution along these lines.

(2) The main objective at the moment must be to get at least a de facto cease fire in order to create an atmosphere in which private negotiations might have the best chances for success. After the 6-power resolution is vetoed in the Security Council the United States may press to have the question transmitted in some form to the Assembly. Even if the United States does not insist on a stronger version for the Assembly, the 6-power resolution is not entirely compatible with the idea of a cease fire and it would therefore be highly desirable if some means could be found to introduce the cease fire idea into the picture before the Assembly embarks on a discussion of the 6-power resolution. A resolution might, for example, be introduced in the Security Council calling for a cease fire pending an examination of the issues, or if this is impossible, the call for a cease fire might be introduced in the Assembly.

(3) The adoption of a cease fire would provide at least the opportunity for direct negotiations between representatives of the United Nations and of the Chinese Communist Government.

(4) Every effort should be made to avoid any formal decision at this time by the United Nations that Communist China is an aggressor, since once Communist China is labelled an aggressor the door will be closed to a settlement of the issues of Formosa and of Chinese Communist representation in the United Nations, which are intimately bound up with the problem of Chinese intervention in North Korea.

(5) In the event that it becomes impossible after a period of delay to refuse to label Communist China an aggressor, any resolution doing this should be conditional in that it would state that the Chinese Communists would be deemed to be an aggressor if they had not by a certain date complied with certain decisions of the United Nations, such as an appeal for a cease fire.

(6) After that date had passed, the Assembly might then recommend to its members to impose all the non-military sanctions against Communist China and urge them to give sufficient support to the Unified Command to enable it to hold a line at the waist of Korea and protect the rest of Korea against Chinese aggression, pending a satisfactory political solution.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference my immediately preceding telegram.†
Following is the text of message to Prime Minister Nehru, Begins: I am returning shortly to the United Nations Assembly, but before leaving Ottawa I wanted to send you this personal message. I should tell you, in the first place, how much I have enjoyed working with Sir Benegal Rau and your delegation since the Assembly opened. Our judgments have not always been the same, but we have always had the same objectives in mind and found that our views were usually pretty close together; especially on the paramount necessity of localizing and ending the conflict in Korea, in a way which will both discharge our obligations under the United Nations Charter and satisfy Asian public opinion.

2. These hopes have been, temporarily at least, rudely shattered by the developments of the last few days, and there is now, of course, grave possibility that the war in Korea may be extended, with unpredictable and calamitous consequences. From your published letter to Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan a few days ago, I know that you share our anxiety over this possibility. The intervention by Chinese forces in Korea, with the violent and provocative defence of that action by the representative of the Chinese Communist Government at the Security Council, may cause such a strong reaction in United States public opinion that irrevocable and unwise military decisions may be taken before there is an opportunity for more cautious counsels to prevail. In this critical situation, I am wondering whether an intervention by you might not effect a pause which would provide an opportunity for a peaceful settlement to be reached. You occupy a unique position as the most influential leader of Asian opinion, and at the same time you command a great fund of good will and admiration in western countries. You have also consistently urged the necessity of seeking peaceful solutions through mediation and conciliation. For these reasons your voice would have more chance of being heard above the frightening clamour than that of anyone else in the world today.

3. What I have in mind is that you might consider making a public appeal for a cease fire in Korea, and for the cessation of Chinese armed intervention, so that the possibilities of a settlement in which the Government in Peking could participate, might be explored. This appeal might also be accompanied by parallel action by the Indian Delegation in the United Nations. If hostilities were then temporarily arrested in Korea a meeting might be arranged with representatives of the Peking Government and of certain members of the United Nations, possibly in India, under which a political settlement could be worked out. I appreciate, of course, that it might be difficult for you to make such an appeal, especially if you did not have grounds for believing that it would meet with wide support. I certainly am not in a position, nor is anyone, I suppose, in a position to give you any assurance that such support would be forthcoming, especially from the United States, where the reaction to recent events, while it has been ordered and restrained in Administration circles in Washington, has been somewhat more violent in other quarters. My own opinion, however, is that an appeal of this kind from you would get a very deep and sympathetic reception in many capitals and, more certainly and possibly more importantly, in the hearts of many millions of people. My justification for making this proposal is our own very friendly personal relationship, which I cherish, and the tragic dangers that are implicit in the present situation.

4. I should add that I have shown this message to my Prime Minister. Mr. St. Laurent, who sends you his warm good wishes, feels that you will undoubtedly already have considered what action, if any, you could take in the present circumstances, and that, therefore, any suggestions from me on this matter may be unnecessary. But he feels also, and I share his feeling, that you will not misunderstand my motives in sending you this message.

5. Kindest personal regards. Message ends.

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference your telegram No. 165, November 30th, and reference my telegram No. 275, December 2nd,† your personal message to Nehru.
Following is the text of personal message from Nehru to you. Text begins:

Thanks very much for your letter of December 1st, which your High Commissioner conveyed to me yesterday. I have given your suggestion that I make a public appeal for a cease-fire in Korea and for cessation of Chinese armed intervention, the most careful consideration in consultation with my colleagues. You need no reminder of my readiness to do whatever I can to help the cause of peace. Ever since this Korean conflict began, we have been exerting ourselves for localization of conflict, sometimes by suggestions which have brought us much misunderstandings and criticisms. Personally, I do not mind these, and am always prepared to take the risk for a cause which is just and which, indeed, in the present case may involve the future of mankind and of civilization. I feel reluctant, however, to make a public appeal unless there is a reasonable chance of a favourable response to it from parties to whom the appeal is addressed. I am by no means sure that in the present situation either Peking or Washington would take such an appeal in good part. Moreover, since you telegraphed to your High Commissioner, Mr. Attlee has undertaken a mission of peace to Washington, and I think you would agree that it would be wise for us to wait until he has had a chance of discussing the matter with President Truman. For your information, I am asking Mr. Chipman to repeat to you a personal telegram that I have addressed to Mr. Attlee. That will apprise you of my thinking. If you have any comments on my intention to make a short statement to our Parliament, next Monday, on lines that I have indicated to Mr. Attlee, I should be happy to receive and consider them.

In conclusion, let me assure you that I have not in the least misunderstood your initiative. Indeed, it is heartening to me to know that we are all thinking hard how best to save the world from the catastrophe of another major war, and resolved to do our best to accomplish that purpose.

Please convey my best wishes to your Prime Minister. I hope to see you both in London early next month.[65]

Memorandum from Embassy of United States

SECRET [Ottawa], December 2, 1950

CHINESE INTERVENTION IN KOREA

Memorandum from the United States Embassy left by Mr. Bliss with Mr. Ritchie at 10:00 a.m. today. This memorandum is a circular instruction sent by the State Department to all the members of the Security Council except Russia and to all countries participating in Korea.

In light Soviet veto of 6-power resolution on Korea we can see at this time no rpt no further fruitful action which can be taken in SC. Attitude of Chinese Commie representatives has been completely intransigent and non-conciliatory. Efforts that have been made by various delegations which have recognized Peiping regime to consult with these representatives have been repulsed, and representatives in New York are being isolated from contact with all delegates except that of Soviet. Under these circumstances best way of bringing to bear full weight of world opinion is by airing in forum of GA real nature and gravity of Chinese intervention in Korea. At present time it is only in this way that we feel that any influence can be exerted on future action of Chinese Commie govt and Chinese people.

Furthermore, in light of Soviet veto, to bring case before GA is fully in conformity with concepts which underlie resolution adopted at this session of GA called "uniting for peace".[66] Having adopted that resolution by such an overwhelming vote, it would be almost inconceivable for members of UN to sit by in inactivity after 6-power resolution has been defeated in SC by Soviet veto.

Furthermore, US believes that we should exhaust in all processes for reconciling differences and bringing about peaceful settlement.

In our view most effective manner of bringing matter before GA would be to have six sponsors of vetoed SC resolution join in proposing a new item on assembly's agenda, "intervention of the central govt of the people's republic of China in Korea" as a matter of importance and urgency. In New York consultations it has been suggested and we agree that first step in GA consideration should be adoption of vetoed SC resolution. Depending on new developments, views of other delegates and response of Chinese Commie govt the GA might wish to make further recommendations or modify or expand that resolution.

Request you take up on urgent basis with Foreign Office our attitude on this question with view to having govt to which you accredited issue instructions to its UN delegation to join with US in referring matter to GA. We would have in mind suitable announcement by 6-powers that we were agreed to refer matter jointly to GA at earliest possible date and thereafter formally to propose agenda item to SYG.

CHINESE INTERVENTION IN KOREA
STATE DEPARTMENT MEMORANDUM OF TODAY'S DATE

I have told Mr. Bliss that I would phone him after 6:00 p.m. and give him our comments on the memorandum which he left this morning. I suggest that I might make orally to him the following points:

1. We are glad to note that the United States view is that the first step in the consideration by the General Assembly should be the 6-power resolution which has been vetoed in the Security Council.

2. We consider it most important that every effort should be made at this stage to avoid any formal decision by the United Nations that Communist China is an aggressor.

3. In the light of the situation as we know it at present, we agree that there appears to be no further fruitful action which could be taken by the Security Council. The situation might, however, change.

4. While we agree that the action proposed by the United States is in conformity with the concepts which underlie the "uniting for peace" resolution, we do not consider that it is necessary or wise, in referring the matter to the General Assembly, to link it to this resolution.

5. There should be no effort to press for an early vote in the Assembly on the 6-power or any other resolution. The timetable should be kept flexible, since it must depend on the progress of diplomatic discussions.

MEMORANDUM ON KOREA

1. Ever since the decision was made to resist the aggression on Korea, the determination of the democratic powers has been to use their utmost endeavours to limit hostilities in the Korean area and to have them come to an end as quickly as possible. The only country whose interests would be served by a war with China would be the Soviet Union.

2. A war with China would commit to this theatre of operations a dangerously large proportion of the limited armed resources of the democratic powers at the expense of other fronts such as Western Europe, where the Soviet Union may intend to conduct its major campaign if a third world war should break out.

3. There is danger that a war with China would lead to Soviet armed intervention to assist China since the only assumption on which we can safely proceed is that before the Chinese Communist Government decided to intervene in force in Korea it had received from the Soviet Union assurances of assistance in the event of U.N. military retaliation against China.

4. The situation in Korea must therefore be looked at in the light of global strategy and of the present balance of armed forces between the Soviet world and the democratic world. Given determination by the democratic world, time is on our side and we should therefore play for time so long as we can do so without denying our obligations under the United Nations Charter.

5. It is moreover essential that public opinion not only in the Americas but in Western Europe and in the democratic states of Asia, should be convinced that we are doing everything we possibly can to avoid war. If despite all our efforts China and the Soviet Union should precipitate a war, it is essential that the democratic nations should be united in their resistance to aggression. This end would be more difficult to achieve unless there had been sustained common efforts to avert a catastrophe.

6. The door should therefore be left open until the last possible moment for a settlement with the Chinese Communists by negotiation. Consequently any formal decision by the United Nations at this stage that Communist China is an aggressor would, we think, be unwise.

7. Meanwhile every opportunity for discussion of the issues with Communist China should be explored. Once the military situation has been stabilized, a cease fire might be attainable. This might be followed by the creation of a demilitarized zone. In these conditions, a modus vivendi might be sought by negotiation. In this connection consideration might have to be given to the other related aspects of the Chinese problem, such as Formosa and Chinese representation in the United Nations.

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following is the text of the personal message from me to Mr. Nehru which is referred to in my immediately preceding telegram.† Message Begins:

1. I am obliged to you for your message of 2nd December and for the careful and friendly consideration which you gave to my personal suggestion. I understand fully your reluctance to make a public appeal for a cease-fire in Korea and for the cessation of Chinese armed intervention at a time when it is very uncertain how such an appeal would be received either in Washington or in Peking. The diplomatic situation, as you point out, has also been substantially changed by the announcement of Mr. Attlee's visit to Mr. Truman, which will provide an opportunity for opinions in close consonance with those entertained here and by your Government to be urged on the President. In the meantime, I think that a statement of a more general kind, such as is suggested in your message to Mr. Attlee, would be highly useful.

2. I am encouraged to note that we seem to be thinking along very similar lines at this moment of grave crisis. This similarity of outlook seems also to extend to the question of using the atomic bomb in Asia. In a statement which I made this morning at the opening of a Federal-Provincial Conference here, I touched on this question; and I am asking Chipman to give you a copy of what I said on that occasion at the same time as he gives you this message.[67]

3. I am not likely to be accompanying Mr. St. Laurent to London for the meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers; but I may be in Europe at that time for a North Atlantic Council meeting. If so, I will look forward very warmly to seeing you again. Message Ends.

MEMORANDUM ON KOREA

I attach a copy of the secret memorandum on Korea which has now been delivered to the Foreign Offices of twelve countries.

2. I should like to have your permission to instruct our missions in a number of other countries to give the memorandum to the local Foreign Office. It seems to me that on balance it would be wise to give it to the Foreign Offices of all countries which are members of the U.N. and where we have a mission, with the exception, of course, of the USSR, Poland, and probably Yugoslavia.[68] We have found in the past that a number of the delegations in New York, especially from some of the Latin American countries, act very often without much instruction and guidance from their home office. They are therefore peculiarly subject to United States pressure.

3. It would therefore, it seems to me, be useful if the Foreign Offices of these countries in particular had copies of our memorandum since this might strengthen their hand in giving useful instructions to their delegation in New York.

4. From the information which we now have available, it looks as if the general approach set forth in our memorandum is very much the same as the general approach of the other Commonwealth countries, and the Western European countries. Consequently I do not think that we would be in much danger of getting out on a limb by letting all the friendly governments at which we are represented have a copy of the memorandum.

5. There is one general consideration which I think is important here and that is that we should in a period of crisis such as this do our best to ensure that we make the fullest possible use of our missions abroad.

6. If we were to add only a few names to the list of countries which have already received the memorandum, then I suggest that we add at least Denmark, Brazil and Mexico. Denmark is the only one of the North Atlantic countries which are also members of the U.N. and at which we are also represented to which we have not given the memorandum. The reason for the suggestion for the inclusion of Brazil and Mexico is that, if you should find it necessary, perhaps before the House of Commons, to refer to our having transmitted this memorandum, it might look a little odd if we had not transmitted it to any of the Latin American republics.

1. Since President Truman's statements on November 30[69] about the possibility of using the atomic bomb in Korea, I have been considering our own position. You will have seen what I told the press here on November 30 on an "off-the-record" basis, as the text was sent in our telegram No. EX-2462 of December 2.†

2. In view of the rapidly deteriorating military situation in Korea, I think we should waste no time in informing the U.S. Government of some of the considerations which weigh most heavily with us, and no doubt with them, on this most delicate and vitally important problem — the use, or the threat of use, of the atomic bomb. For that reason, I am sending you in my immediately following message the text of a memorandum which expresses our views. There would of course be less risk of the Americans feeling that we were delivering an unnecessary homily on their doorstep if you were to put these points orally at an appropriate level in the State Department, but in a matter of this moment I think there should be some written record. I leave to your judgment, however, the method of presentation. The memorandum has been deliberately prepared without reference to President Truman's statement so that it could be taken as an independent appreciation, for the use of the Canadian Government, a copy of which we are giving to the U.S. Government for their information as an indication of our thinking on a subject of the greatest common interest to both Governments.

3. If you have any suggestions for amendment of the memorandum before it is left with the State Department I should, of course, be glad to consider them.

Note

Memorandum

SECRET [Ottawa], December 3, 1950

KOREA AND THE ATOMIC BOMB

1. The military authorities may argue that the atomic bomb is just another weapon. But, in the minds of ordinary people everywhere in the world, it is far more than that and has acquired an immensely greater intrinsic significance. The anxiety with which the possibility of the use of the bomb, by either side, is regarded has been strikingly and increasingly evident of late among our friends in Europe and in Asia. This is the main reason for the appeal, even in free countries, of the cynical Communist "peace" campaign.

2. The psychological and political consequences of the employment of the bomb, or the threat of its employment, in the present critical situation would be incalculably great. The risk of retaliation, to which our allies in Europe feel themselves to be exposed, would affect materially their will to resist, and the imminent prospect of atomic war over Korea, when our defences elsewhere are still weak, cannot fail to stimulate the tendencies toward "neutralism" which the development of strength and unity on our side is beginning to overcome.

3. The strategic use of the bomb against Chinese cities might conceivably change the course of military events in Asia now, but at the risk of destroying the cohesion and unity of purpose of the Atlantic community. Certainly its use, for a second time, against an Asian people would dangerously weaken the links that remain between the Western world and the peoples of the East.

4. The atomic bomb is the most powerful deterrent element in the arsenal of the free world. To what extent this is because of actual military potential, to what extent to psychological factors, it is impossible for us, and probably for anyone, to know. In any event it is universally regarded as the ultimate weapon. It should be treated as such. The effectiveness of the bomb as a tactical weapon cannot be fully appreciated. The very uncertainty of its capabilities in the tactical role must add materially to its deterrent value. Once it has been used tactically, however, much of its force as a deterrent may disappear, unless its use for this purpose has proven overwhelmingly successful.

5. The Canadian people would hold their Government responsible for making the Canadian views known to the United States before the atomic bomb were to be used. This is especially true in present circumstances because of the United Nations character of the operations in Korea.

6. Furthermore, in atomic matters, the Canadian Government has, from the beginning, been a partner in the tri-partite co-operation which stemmed from the Quebec Agreement between President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill in 1943. Mr. Mackenzie King was associated with the Joint Declaration of November, 1945, by the heads of the three Governments directly concerned. Through its membership in the Combined Policy Committee, the Canadian Government has continued to assist in the development of our joint resources of raw materials and of scientific knowledge. Canada has made a direct contribution to building up the atomic stockpile. Although the modus vivendi of the Combined Policy Committee concluded in January, 1946, does not include, as did the Quebec Agreement, the clause providing for prior consultation, the Canadian Government would be inevitably involved, and in a specially close sense, in the consequences of the use of the atomic bomb.

7. The mass intervention of the Chinese Communists in Korea may lead to the third world war. In the present critical military situation, those who have their own men engaged (and this applies, of course, particularly to the United States) are obviously entitled to have full consideration given to the use of every available means of supporting the ground forces fighting under the United Nations Command. This is natural and inevitable. But, before a decision of such immense and awful consequence, for all of us, is taken, there should be consultation among the governments principally concerned.

Repeat Candel No. 68. Your EX-2474 and EX-2475† of December 4th, Korea and the atomic bomb.

1. Several passages in the memorandum given in EX-2475 seem to me to convey the impression that the Canadian Government believes that a unilateral decision to authorize the use of the bomb in Korea is likely to be taken and probably very soon. I am sure that this is not the case and that the statement issued by the White House after the President's press conference should be taken at its face value.[70] It is true that the President's answers to some of the questions addressed to him were not phrased as clearly as they might have been and were misleadingly reported around the world. It would, I think, be resented if I was to present the memorandum to the State Department without emendation of such phrases as "the imminent prospect of atomic war over Korea" in paragraph 2 and "before an irreparable decision is taken" at the end of paragraph 7. Indeed, I would prefer a general toning down of the language, especially that used in paragraphs 1, 2, 8, and 9.

2. I am certain that little consideration has been given to the use of atomic weapons in Korea or Manchuria. It is doubtful whether the military results that could be achieved would be sufficiently great to warrant their use on military grounds alone. Even if Mukden, Harbin, and Dairen were destroyed, it is not likely that the dislocation would be sufficient seriously to affect the Chinese operations in Korea because of the nature of their arms and equipment. The loss of even several hundred thousand lives in Manchuria would also not be likely to lead a Government of a country known for its indifference to human life to alter its purposes.

3. Although I have not myself discussed the possible employment of atomic weapons in Korea at a high level in the State Department, I have talked the matter over with the British and Netherlands Ambassadors, both of whom would, I think, agree with what is said in this paragraph.

4. My immediately following message contains a suggested revision and simplification of the memorandum.

Following is text of revised memorandum, Begins: The military authorities may argue that the atomic bomb is just another weapon. But, in the minds of ordinary people everywhere in the world, it is far more than that and has acquired an immensely greater intrinsic significance. The anxiety with which the possibility of the use of the bomb, by either side, is regarded has been strikingly and increasingly evident of late among our friends in Europe and in Asia. This is the main reason for the appeal, even in free countries, of the cynical Communist "peace" campaign.

2. The psychological and political consequences of the employment of the bomb, or the threat of its employment, in the present critical situation would be incalculably great. The risk of retaliation, to which our allies in Europe feel themselves to be exposed, would affect materially their will to resist, and even the consideration of the possibility of atomic war in Asia, when our defences are still weak, cannot fail to stimulate the tendencies toward "neutralism" which the development of strength and unity on our side is beginning to overcome.

3. The strategic use of the bomb against Chinese cities might conceivably change the course of military events in Asia now, but at the risk of destroying the cohesion and unity of purpose of the Atlantic community. Certainly its use, for a second time, against an Asian people would dangerously weaken the links that remain between the Western world and the peoples of the East.

4. The atomic bomb is the most powerful deterrent element in the arsenal of the free world. To what extent this is because of actual military potential, to what extent to psychological factors, it is impossible for us, and probably for anyone, to know. The effectiveness of the bomb as a tactical weapon cannot be fully appreciated. The very uncertainty of its capabilities in the tactical role must add materially to its deterrent value. Once it has been used tactically, however, much of its force as a deterrent may disappear, unless its use for this purpose has proven overwhelmingly successful.

5. The Canadian people would hold their Government responsible for making the Canadian views known to the United States before the atomic bomb were to be used. This is especially true in present circumstances because of the United Nations character of the operations in Korea.

6. Furthermore, in atomic matters, the Canadian Government has, from the beginning, been a partner in the tripartite cooperation which stemmed from the Quebec Agreement between President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill in 1943. SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

KOREA

Yesterday afternoon I had a talk with the Secretary-General, who brought me up-to-date, very confidentially, on developments in regard to talks with the Chinese Communist delegation. These have been more important than previous reports had indicated. Trygve Lie said that he had had two or three discussions with the Chinese, and though he had found them "cocky" and "tough Communists", nevertheless they now expressed a willingness to talk and, indeed, to meet other delegations who wished to talk with them. As a result, Trygve Lie had his dinner party last night. At that dinner Jebb arranged to have lunch with Wu yesterday and Zafrullah is having dinner with him today. It appears, however, that the most important negotiator among the Chinese is not Wu but Chiao.

2. Trygve Lie said that he had been racking his brains to think of something constructive that might be proposed. He had suggested to the British and the Americans a few days ago that he himself might fly to Tokyo and Korea, and to Peking if the Chinese Communists would receive him. The Americans and the British did not discourage him in this, and the Chinese Communist delegate's reaction was not entirely negative, though he said he would have to take it up with his Government. Lie's trip, however, has been called off, or at least postponed, pending the result of Attlee's visit to Washington.

3. Lie also told Wu that he was contemplating transferring the United Nations office in Shanghai to Peking, and putting it in charge of a senior United Nations official. (Lie added that he would like to send the man that I had recommended to him a fortnight or so ago, Ralph Bunche.) The Chinese Communists said they would also refer this matter to Peking.

4. Lie said that he told the Communists that while they had legitimate grounds for complaint at not being admitted to membership in the United Nations, they had acted very badly in Korea, and had broken every article of the Charter by their intervention. He put it to them that they should now cease fire, halt their advance before the 38th Parallel, and negotiate a settlement. If they acted reasonably, their chances for admission to the United Nations would be greatly improved and he himself thought that (he mentioned this very confidentially) he could keep an Assistant Secretary-General post open for one of them, and other positions on the Secretariat, as he was soon to begin a house-cleaning of his staff on the completion of his five-year term of office. The Chinese said that they would also forward these proposals to Peking, but stated that any negotiations would have to include Formosa.

5. Lie said that their price for withdrawing from North Korea is admission to the United Nations, withdrawal of the United States fleet from Formosa, withdrawal of United Nations troops from Korea, and United Nations supervised elections there. Lie told them that these demands were excessive and that they should moderate them. He expects to receive the views of the Peking Government on these matters very shortly.

6. He himself feels (and I was somewhat surprised at this) that the United States cannot now withdraw their fleet from Formosa, and that the United Nations must be careful not to appear to be too weak or advocating appeasement. On the other hand, he is desperately anxious, first to limit and then end the Korean war. He is confused, as indeed others are, as to how to reconcile these two objectives. But on the whole, I found him somewhat more optimistic than I had expected.

7. He had read with much interest the statement I made Monday in Ottawa, as indeed a good many others here seemed to have done. I gather that the Americans are disappointed in it.[72]

8. I must emphasize that Lie's remarks to me were personal and confidential as he claims he has not been discussing matters with other delegations because of the terror of the Chinese Communists that there should be a leakage in the press that they have gone as far as they have gone already opening negotiations.

9. Sir Benegal Rau also asked to see me yesterday afternoon and I had an interesting talk with him. The Chinese had discussed matters with him in a fairly friendly and frank way and had taken generally the line they took with Mr. Lie in regard to conditions which must be accepted before they would withdraw from Korea.

10. He then mentioned to me that he had been discussing with the Asian delegations, including the Moslem ones, the issue of an appeal to the Chinese Communists to cease fire or, in any event, not to cross the 38th Parallel. He asked me what I thought about this. At first it seemed to me not to promise very much in the way of results, but after talking with him I came to the conclusion that it would be a good thing to do and that, in any event, it would certainly be unwise to discourage Indian and Asian initiative in this matter, even if the Chinese Communists rejected the appeal. He realized of course, that if such an appeal is to be of any value at all, it must be made quickly so it will probably be made public this morning.

[72] Voir Documents sur la crise coréenne, pp. 14-17./See Documents on the Korean Crisis, pp. 13-15.

11. I should add that Lie, in a talk with the Czech delegate ascertained that [Viliam] Siroky seemed also to be aware of Chinese Communist proposals, and it seems clear that the Communist delegations have been discussing these matters together. When Lie asked Siroky if the Chinese Communist views were shared by Vishinsky, Siroky said that he thought so. All this means that we will likely soon be confronted with Communist proposals that in return for peace in Korea, China should be admitted to the United Nations, the United States fleet should leave Formosan waters, and that there should be United Nations-supervised elections in Korea, with troops on both sides withdrawing from the Peninsula. It might be that the Communists will be willing to modify these demands, but with the military situation as it is, one cannot count on this. I gather that the Americans are aware of the above discussions and that Mr. Attlee has also been informed of them.

12. Finally, I had a talk with Keith Officer. He said that he had seen Acheson in Washington on Sunday and had impressed on him (1) the necessity of setting up some Committee of those Governments actively involved in the Korean operations, to exercise some control over MacArthur, and (2) the necessity of the United States keeping the Governments in question more completely informed of military developments.

KOREA

1. At a meeting of Commonwealth delegations Tuesday morning, both Jebb and Rau gave some account of their contacts with the Chinese Communist delegation. Jebb said that Wu, Chiao, an interpreter, and a woman member of the delegation, had had lunch with him. He had got the impression that Wu was a sensible and practical person who might be inclined to take an empirical view of the situation in the Far East, but that Chiao was a much more rigid and doctrinaire Communist. Jebb said that he had advanced to them the argument that there was no chance of securing their main objectives in the Far East unless they would agree in Korea to some principle under which there would be a withdrawal of troops on both sides, and acceptance of a Government established under the aegis of the United Nations. He also said that he put it to Wu that the general work of reconstructing China, upon which the Chinese Government must wish to concentrate, would be indefinitely delayed if the war became general. Jebb added that he gained even more strongly than ever the impression that the central issue for the Chinese delegation was the question of Formosa.

2. Rau said that at a meeting on Friday last, he had suggested to the Chinese Communists that a settlement might be made on the basis of a cease fire, and, subsequently, a demilitarized zone. Wu had promised to transmit Rau's suggestions to Peiping and to let him know the reply. When Rau saw Wu again on Sunday, no reply had yet been received, and Wu had suggested that it might be the middle of the week before he heard.

3. Rau added that Wu had said in the course of their conversation that China was now organized into twenty-eight provinces, not including Tibet, which was regarded as an autonomous region with much more extensive local authority than any province. He referred to a declaration of November 13 which the Chinese Government had made concerning Tibet. Wu said that this declaration would satisfy "even Rau".

4. In regard to the declaration made on Tuesday evening by the Asian States concerning Korea, Rau said that they had suggested to the Chinese that they stop at the 38th Parallel because they felt, if that line were crossed, it then would be extremely difficult to avoid a situation in which China would be at war with the United Nations.

5. In regard to Korean matters generally, I remarked that it was becoming increasingly important to ascertain the attitude of the United States Government toward the present military situation and its consequences. There were now suggestions about a cease fire with subsequent negotiations, but we did not know whether the United States Government would be prepared to acquiesce in either of these suggestions, nor were we even sure of the estimate of the military position upon which the U.S. authorities were making their plans. Keith Officer, who said he fully agreed with my remarks, added that he thought it important for the United States to give us some idea of its intentions before we became engaged in a debate on the next stage in the Political Committee. If no "lead" were forthcoming, he thought we should postpone the debate. Younger and Jebb said they thought some agreement on policy would probably emerge from the meetings between Attlee and Truman. In the meantime, the United States delegation felt that it was under some pressure from its public to do something, even if only to file the six Power resolution in the First Committee.

6. There was some discussion as to whether or not, when the new item was debated in the First Committee, some Western Power should take the initiative to invite Chinese Communists to attend. It was realized that they would probably refuse, but we nevertheless felt that an opportunity must be given them to attend. There was also some inconclusive discussion as to what should be done in the First Committee to offset either an effort to amend the six Power resolution by naming the Chinese as aggressors, or alternatively, to set up some ill-considered process of negotiation with the Chinese Communists.

The General Assembly

RECALLING the resolution adopted by the Security Council on 25th June 1950, determining that the North Korean forces had committed a breach of the peace, and calling upon all members of the United Nations to refrain from giving assistance to the North Korean authorities,

RECALLING the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on 7th October 1950, which sets forth the policies of the United Nations in respect to Korea,

NOTING that armed forces of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China are conducting military operations against the United Nations forces in Korea,

REAFFIRMING that United Nations forces should not remain in any part of Korea otherwise than so far as necessary for achieving the objectives of stability throughout Korea and the establishment of a unified independent and democratic government in the sovereign state of Korea, as set forth in the resolution of the General Assembly dated 7th October 1950,

INSISTENT that no action be taken which might lead to the spread of the Korean conflict to other areas and thereby further endanger international peace and security,

CALLS UPON all states and authorities, and in particular those responsible for the action noted above, to refrain from assisting or encouraging the North Korean authorities, to prevent their nationals or individuals or units of their armed forces from giving assistance to North Korean forces and to cause the immediate withdrawal of any such nationals, individuals, or units which may presently be in Korea;

AFFIRMS that it is the policy of the United Nations to hold the Chinese frontier with Korea inviolate and fully to protect legitimate Chinese and Korean interests in the frontier zone;

CALLS ATTENTION to the grave danger which continued intervention by Chinese forces in Korea would entail for the maintenance of such a policy;

REQUESTS the United Nations Commission for the unification and rehabilitation of Korea to consider urgently and to assist in the settlement of any problems relating to conditions on the Korean frontier in which states or authorities on the other side of the frontier have an interest.

VIEWS OF THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ON POSSIBLE USE OF ATOMIC WEAPONS IN THE FAR EAST

1. As reported in my teletype to Ottawa WA-3157 (repeated to New York in Candel No. 78) of December 6th,† a copy of the memorandum containing the views of the Canadian Government on the possible use of atomic weapons in the Far East (revised in accordance with your instructions contained in Candel 74 of December 6th) was given yesterday to the Department of State through R. Gordon Arneson, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State on atomic matters. Two copies of the revised memorandum† as given to the State Department are attached.

2. Mr. Arneson, as you know, is the senior official in the State Department who concerns himself exclusively with atomic energy matters, and it was for the purpose of obtaining considered reactions to our memorandum that our paper was given to him.

3. He said that he was glad to receive our memorandum as the issues referred in it had been discussed between Mr. Attlee and President Truman and had also been under lively discussion in the press. Mr. Arneson offered some preliminary comments which are contained in a memorandum of conversation, two copies of which are attached.

TOP SECRET [Washington], December 6, 1950

KOREA AND THE ATOM BOMB

Memorandum of conversation between Mr. R.G. Arneson, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State on Atomic Energy, and G. Ignatieff.

Acting upon the instructions that the views of the Canadian Government on the use of the atomic bomb in the present circumstances of war in Korea should be made clear to the U.S. Government, a copy of a Memorandum on the question, as revised and approved by Mr. Pearson in his message Candel No. 74 of December 6th, was given to Mr. Arneson at the State Department on the afternoon of December 6th. Mr. Arneson was chosen for the receipt of this Memorandum, as he is the senior official in the State Department dealing exclusively with atomic energy questions and participates in all discussions on this subject.

In giving Mr. Arneson the Memorandum, Mr. Ignatieff emphasized the importance which the Canadian Government attached to the views contained in it and asked that, if possible, comment, either in verbal or written form, should be made on it when its contents had been studied.

Mr. Arneson quickly read the Memorandum and said that he would be glad to offer certain personal comments and that he would seek authority to provide written comments later. He observed that it was particularly appropriate at this time that the Canadian Government should submit its views on this question. The remarks made by the President at his press conference the previous week had inevitably given rise to public discussion of the use of this weapon and its implications. The question had also come up in the discussions between President Truman and Mr. Attlee. A brief statement of the U.S. position had been given Mr. Attlee, which said in effect that the U.S. Government was very much alive to the implications of the use of the atomic weapon and was giving its implications urgent consideration; that the U.S. Government intends, if the occasion should arise to use the weapon, to consult with the United Kingdom and other countries signatory to the North Atlantic Treaty if time and circumstances permit. Mr. Arneson thought that a paper drawn in similar terms might be made available to the Canadian Government as one of the partners in tripartite co-operation.

Mr. Arneson then offered to outline the developments of thinking in the State Department on the use of the atomic weapon and its implications, as an indication of the kind of U.S. official views which might soon be formulated. Mr. Ignatieff said that this would be very helpful.

Mr. Arneson began by outlining the procedure which would govern the making of a decision by the United States to use the atomic weapon at the present time. The decision to use the weapon requires, in the first place, a recommendation from the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff, which would state whether the use of the weapon was necessary or desirable from a military point of view. Mr. Arneson said that, so far as he knew, no such recommendation had been considered by the Joint Chiefs of Staff in connection with the Korean war and no responsible U.S. military authority had urged its use. The recommendation of the Joint Chiefs of Staff would then be considered by a special committee of the National Security Council consisting of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defence, and the Chairman of the United States Atomic Energy Commission. This committee would have to take into account the political and psychological consideration. This committee would then render its advice to the President, who would make the decision. Mr. Arneson emphasized that the armed forces do not have any atomic weapons at their disposal, unless the President authorizes the release of specific weapons from the custody of the Atomic Energy Commission to the armed forces for specific tasks.

Mr. Arneson said that about two years ago some consideration was given by the National Security Council to the question of the conditions which might apply to the possible use of the atomic bomb, but no decisions were made at that time. The procedure outlined in the preceding paragraph, however, was agreed. In view of the deepening international crisis, this question had now been re-opened and a study was being prepared, and Mr. Arneson had been charged to prepare a preliminary paper for the consideration of the Secretary of State. What follows represents Mr. Arneson's own thinking of the way in which he proposes to analyze the problem for the consideration of the Secretary of State and the other members of the committee of the National Security Council.

It was necessary to proceed from certain assumptions. In the first place, the atomic weapon so far developed is useful only as a means of strategic, not tactical, warfare. To use the weapon tactically, it would be necessary to devise and construct an embodiment capable of delivery through one or other of the following tactical weapons: fighter bombers, guided missiles, or artillery. Although work is proceeding on the means to put the atomic weapon to tactical use, the proper devices do not exist today. It also has to be assumed that atomic weapons are available only in limited numbers and should be conserved for use against important strategic targets. Such targets exist in the industrialized areas of the Soviet Union and do not exist to any important extent in territories on the periphery of the Soviet Union. This consideration particularly applies, in the opinion of Mr. Arneson, to the areas immediately concerned in the Korean warfare.

If the preceding assumptions are accepted, Mr. Arneson said, it follows that the issue in deciding whether to use the atomic weapon is not so much the question of whether you should use this weapon or that weapon, but the question of what kind of war it is. Mr. Arneson thought that this question should be considered in relation to four possible contingencies:

(a) a war involving only satellite Communist forces (or what he termed a "creeping aggression"), such as has been tried in Korea;

(b) an overt Soviet military attack against a country other than one of the signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty;

(c) an overt Soviet attack on one of the signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty other than the United States, and

(d) an overt Soviet attack against the United States.

The question of consultation with other governments presented a different problem, Mr. Arneson suggested, in each of the contingencies noted above. Contingencies (a) and (b) presented the most difficult problems. In effect, in his opinion, it would involve decision by the United States Government, in consultation with Canada, the United Kingdom, and other NATO countries, as to whether, in the circumstances, they were prepared to go to war with the Soviet Union. That, he said, was the central question which would have to be decided first; the question of whether the atomic bomb would be used would be consequent upon a prior decision on the main issue.

In the case of contingency (c), namely, overt attack against a NATO country other than the United States, the normal consultative processes provided under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization would apply and decisions would have to be related to existing strategic plans of NATO.

As regards contingency (d), namely, in the event that there was an overt Soviet attack against the United States, Mr. Arneson thought he should make it clear that it was very unlikely that the United States Government in effect would consult any other country before retaliating immediately against the Soviet Union. Referring to the clause in the Quebec Agreement, which provided for prior consultation between the parties before the atomic weapon was used, Mr. Arneson said that considerable thought had been given to including some provision for consultation in the modus vivendi when it was negotiated in 1947. However, in the course of the consultations which took place at that time with the Joint Congressional Committee, Senator Vandenberg had said that he could not accept under any circumstances a provision which would in effect tie the hands of the United States Government in the event that it was attacked. No such commitment, Mr. Arneson thought, would be undertaken by the United States Government in the present circumstances. He also wanted to make it clear that the question of immediate retaliation by the United States with atomic weapons would arise whatever the form of attack used by the Soviet Union upon the United States. The question would be whether the national security of the United States was directly affected by the attack by the Soviet Union, and not whether the Soviet Union used atomic weapons first against the United States.

Mr. Arneson said that the question had also been raised whether the United Nations should be consulted before the atomic weapon was used. The United Nations would certainly be called on to decide whether an aggression had occurred and to determine the aggressor. This in turn presumably would affect considerably the decision of the United States and other NATO countries, having in mind the various contingencies noted above. He did not think, however, that the United States Government would accept the idea that the United Nations should undertake to decide whether atomic weapons should be used in any particular circumstances.

The question also arose as to whether there should be a public declaration in advance of the use of the atomic weapon. If it were agreed that the use of the atomic weapon would only be applied in the event of war with the Soviet Union, then the U.S. Government would not be inclined to favour any action which would give the Soviet Union advance notice of an atomic attack and thus put the Soviet defences on the alert. However, consideration would have to be given to the kind of public statement which might be used for the purposes of psychological warfare. For instance, a public declaration might be issued to the effect that the Soviet Government by its persistent acts of aggression had brought upon the Soviet people the use of this dreadful weapon and the Soviet people would be urged to liberate themselves from their tyrants in order to avoid further attack of this kind.

In conclusion, Mr. Arneson emphasized again that these were personal views which he was developing for consideration by the committee of the National Security Council and that they went beyond, in some respects, the ground covered by the Canadian Government Memorandum. He hoped that these views, however, would give us an indication of the trend of United States official thinking on the possible use of the atomic weapon and the question of consultation with other governments. He undertook to get in touch with Mr. Ignatieff shortly and to provide formal comments on the Canadian Government Memorandum.

THE INTERNATIONAL CRISIS ARISING OUT OF THE DEFEAT OF THE U.N. FORCES IN KOREA

In the limited time available to us in the Department and with the situation still so fluid, it has not been feasible to prepare for you a general Departmental memorandum setting forth an analysis of the situation nor would it be profitable at this stage to attempt to draft agreed recommendations on future action.

2. Instead we have had prepared a number of papers by individual officers and these I attach. The views expressed are not all final views by any means, nor are they the concerted views of the Department.

3. There is, however, little difference in the Department on most of the immediate issues. For instance we are unanimous in the view that the undertaking of a "limited war" against Communist China would involve the United Nations (and indeed the United States) in the gravest possible consequences.

4. It seems to us, too, that unless the United States is prepared to recede some distance from its present position on Formosa the prospects of successful negotiations with the Chinese Communists are not great. It seems clear that, for the Chinese, Formosa is a crucial question. Perhaps the farthest they might be prepared to give in would be to agree that, after their occupation of Formosa, they will not establish military bases on the island.[73]

5. The following is a list of the papers which are attached:

(1) The international crisis: Some basic considerations. (Memorandum of December 8 [sic] by Reid).

(2) The defeat in Korea: Some suggestions on how the democracies might respond in time to the challenge. (Memorandum of December 8 [sic] by Reid).

(3) Possible effects in Asia of the defeat in Korea. (Memorandum of December 8 by Norman).

(4) Possible effects in Western Europe of a compromise solution in Korea. (Memorandum of December 9 by Léger).

(5) The importance of Indo-China. (Memorandum of December 9 by Reid).

(6) Some guides to immediate action. (Memorandum of December 9 by LePan).

(7) Summary of reaction in foreign offices abroad to our memorandum of December 2. (Memorandum of December 9 by American Division.)†

(8) Survey of editorial reaction in Canada to your speeches of December 4 and 5. (Memorandum of December 9 by Information Division).†

(9) Canadian policy on Korea: Summary of the assurances of MacArthur and of the cautionary words which we have passed on to the United States during the Korean crisis. (Memorandum of December 9 by American Division).†

Memorandum by Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

THE INTERNATIONAL CRISIS: SOME BASIC CONSIDERATIONS

1. During the three and a half years between the spring of 1947 and the autumn of 1950, the democratic world was subjected to four major shocks or disasters. Each shock or disaster constituted a challenge; and each challenge brought forth a response. Each response in turn was demonstrated by subsequent events to have been inadequate. It was either too little or came too late.

2. The defeat in Korea is the fifth major shock or disaster in this series. If the response to the challenge of this disaster is likewise inadequate, the result may be defeat in a third world war.

[73] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Attlee's idea is a neutralised Formosa with self gov[ernmen]t under Chinese sovereignty. L.B. P[earson].

First Challenge and Response

3. The first disaster was the bleak winter of 1946-47 in Europe which weakened an economy already debilitated by the war. The response to this challenge was the Marshall Plan. It was conceived in June, 1947, but was not brought to birth till twelve months later.

Second Challenge and Response

4. The inadequacy of the Marshall Plan was demonstrated by the Communist seizure of power in Czechoslovakia in February, 1948. The response was the North Atlantic Treaty. It was conceived in March, 1948, but did not come into effect until August, 1949. The period of gestation was seventeen months.

5. Under the North Atlantic Treaty, the Atlantic powers began slowly to increase their military forces and their capacity for combined action.

Third Challenge and Response

6. The inadequacy of the combination of Marshall Plan and North Atlantic Treaty was demonstrated by the crumbling of the Nationalist regime in China during 1949, culminating in the establishment on October 1 of a central Communist government for China. The Western powers were shocked to discover that while they had been holding the line against Russian expansion in Europe, the totalitarian communist bloc had secured mastery over the four hundred million people of China and was pressing against Indo-China, Malaya, Indonesia and the rest of South-East Asia, thereby endangering the security of the whole Western world.

7. After waiting for some of the dust to settle, the Western powers began early in 1950 to re-examine their policies in Asia in an effort to discover what they could usefully do to contain totalitarian communism in Asia. One such re-examination was made at the Colombo meeting of Commonwealth Foreign Ministers in January, 1950. Another re-examination took place in Washington.

8. The result by the spring of 1950 was general acceptance in principle by the Western democracies of the thesis: (a) that their safety would be gravely endangered by the further spread of Chinese or Russian communism in South and South-East Asia; (b) that to prevent such an advance the West must ally itself with the dominant local forces of national liberation and social reform; and (c) that the West must in its own interests give more economic assistance to South and South-East Asia. The Colombo Plan was conceived in Ceylon in January, 1950, but eleven months later it was still in process of gestation.

Fourth Challenge and Response

9. The Colombo Plan and other similar plans for South and South-East Asia were based on the same philosophy as the Marshall Plan for Europe: in order to strengthen weak national societies against the virus of communism, it was necessary to strengthen their economies. Before the Marshall Plan came into effect, the Cominform seizure of power in Czechoslovakia demonstrated that it was inadequate. Similarly before the Colombo and other similar plans came into effect, the Cominform attack on Korea demonstrated that they were likewise inadequate responses to the challenge posed by the victory of communism in China, even though they were buttressed by the Marshall Plan and the North Atlantic Treaty.

10. The response to the challenge of the invasion of Korea on June 25, 1950 was two-fold: in the first place, the North Atlantic powers doubled their estimates of defence expenditures, and pressed on more vigorously with the task of co-ordinating their defence efforts and their armed forces. In the second place, the North Atlantic powers took the first steps to organize the General Assembly of the United Nations as an agency for rallying and organizing the whole democratic world against Cominform aggression.

Fifth Challenge: The Defeat in Korea

11. The defeat in Korea has demonstrated the inadequacy of all the previous responses. They have been proved to be either too little or to have come too late.

Fifth Response ?

12. The question now is: In the light of the proved inadequacy of past responses, what response is the democratic world now to make to the latest and gravest challenge? The previous challenges have succeeded each other at briefer and briefer intervals. The next challenge may be made soon; if the response to it is as inadequate as the responses to previous challenges the result may be defeat in war.

13. Not only were the previous responses inadequate but the interval between the conception of a response and its birth was in retrospect unduly long: twelve months for the Marshall Plan, seventeen months for the North Atlantic Treaty. The march of events is now so fast that we cannot safely contemplate this kind of delay. If the response to the defeat in Korea is to be effective it must be immediate.[74]

14. The following are some of the considerations which seem to be important in determining what the response of the democratic world should be to the challenge posed by the defeat in Korea. In general the considerations are those which would naturally be taken into account in framing policy in war. Much of our present difficulty and danger has its source in our inability to act as if the third world war had broken out.

15. First. The new response must be based on global considerations — political, economic, military and moral. We must keep the whole world in view and see the world as a whole. The Russians can strike at any point on the circumference of their empire. We must therefore plan a global strategy for a global war, which is no longer cold, not yet hot, but which is warm, and which is being waged around the world in the borderlands between the Russian empire and the democratic world, wherever the frontiers of the two worlds touch or border on a buffer zone.

16. Second. In framing the global strategy for the warm war, we must weigh carefully against each other the competing claims on limited resources from the various sections of the frontier between the two worlds — Western Europe, Middle East, the Indian sub-continent, South-East Asia, the Far East, North America.

[74] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
How can we ensure, not only that our response is adequate, but that it cannot be legitimately considered as a challenge itself. L.B. P[earson].

17. Third. We must take immediate and adequate steps to increase the resources available to us both for the immediate defence of the frontier and to hold in reserve. Half measures will be worse than useless: they will constitute a heavy burden on our economies but they will not give us any tolerable degree of security.

18. Fourth. We must take into account all the relevant factors: the military, especially because a third world war may be upon us in a few weeks or a few months; the economic, because we may be in for a long period of warm war or hot war and, unless the war comes soon and we are defeated quickly, economic strength is essential; the political because we need to increase the number of our allies and our alliance potential; the moral because we need the full support of public opinion within the alliance, among potential allies and in the buffer zones, and we need to create as large a fifth column as possible within the empire of our enemies — Russia and its satellites.

19. Fifth. We must balance longer-term against shorter-term considerations. This also is a problem always present in war: thus in the last war the United Kingdom had to balance the short-run advantage of throwing its home air force into the defence of France or holding it in reserve for a later defence of Britain if France fell,[75] ministries of munitions had to decide whether to concentrate on getting maximum production in the next twelve months or maximum production over a three-year period even though this meant less production in the first twelve months.

20. Sixth. Since we are weak now in relation to the Russian empire we must play for time in which to get relatively stronger and we must use that time for all it is worth to get stronger as rapidly as possible — stronger politically, militarily, economically and morally.

21. Seventh. We must bear constantly in mind that an alliance is a precarious creation: it has almost to be created anew every day. It can only continue to be strong and to increase in strength if all its members realize how fragile a thing it is; if they defer to the sensitivities of their fellow allies; if they bear their fair share of the common burden willingly and without complaint; if each member from the strongest to the weakest realizes that it is seldom, if ever, wise for him to secure the reluctant acquiescence of his allies in the whole programme of action which he has put forward; that an alliance needs leadership but that its motto must always be conciliation and compromise.

22. Eighth. We must constantly remember that warm wars like hot wars are merely a means to an end. The purpose of waging war is not to win the war but to attain certain objectives. The objective of the present warm war is not the subjugation of the Cominform empire or its unconditional surrender but the creation of a world in which the Cominform empire and the free democracies can live side by side in peace — not peace without friction but peace without the threat of war.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État suppléant aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

THE DEFEAT IN KOREA: SOME SUGGESTIONS ON HOW THE DEMOCRACIES MIGHT RESPOND IN TIME TO THE CHALLENGE

1. Recent events in Korea have demonstrated that Russia and China are now prepared to run grave risks of precipitating a third world war. It is possible that these two powers have by now decided to precipitate that war during the next twelve months. The effect of Western rearmament will become increasingly important after 1951; time is beginning to be on our side; if therefore the Cominform leaders are convinced that war with the West is inevitable, they may well consider that their best opportunity will be in the twelve months ahead.

2. The defeat in Korea has also demonstrated once again the military weakness of the Western powers. If a third world war should break out within the next three months or so, the only strong weapon which the Western powers would possess is the atomic weapon. Even a successful use of the atomic weapon would not prevent Russia and its allies from occupying within three months all of continental Europe to the Pyrenees and the whole of South-East Asia, and after another three months or so, the whole of the Middle East.

3. Much of this information is by now public property both in the West and in the Cominform world. The grave risk of war in 1951 has been stressed publicly by spokesmen for various governments; in Canada by Mr. Pearson in his address to the federal-provincial conference on December 4.

4. The present situation is therefore comparable to that after Dunkerque in June 1940. The answer at that time was total mobilization in the Commonwealth and partial mobilization in the United States. The motto was: time is of the essence of the problem.

5. We are now trying to buy time by making a deal with the Chinese Communists and probably by re-opening negotiations with Russia through the four-power Council of Foreign Ministers. This time will be bought at the expense of sacrifices of prestige and of compromises with principles. These sacrifices will be made in vain if the time is not wisely spent. Moreover, if the time is not wisely spent, the consequence may be the conquest by Russia of a ruined Western world. Not to spend the time wisely would therefore be an unforgivable sin.

6. The present date set for the accomplishment of the North Atlantic medium-term plan is July 1, 1954. Even the accomplishment of this plan will give us no guarantee that Russia could not defeat us in war. Because of the urgency of the present situation, it would seem wise to change the date for the accomplishment of the plan from July 1, 1954, to July 1, 1952.

7. In a hot third world war, at least five out of every ten members of the working force would be engaged on war work either as members of the armed forces or in armaments production. During the cold war less than one in ten has been engaged in cold war work in the Atlantic countries. The appropriate figure for the present warm war would probably be about half way between these figures, that is, three men in ten. Setting the date of July 1, 1952, for the accomplishment of the medium-term plan would probably require a semi-mobilization of this order of magnitude.

8. In order to save time, proposals along these lines should be referred as quickly as possible to the North Atlantic Council Deputies and they should, in consultation with the appropriate military bodies, have a report ready for the Council when it meets at the end of this month or early in January. Pending consideration by the Council, each North Atlantic country should take immediate steps to increase its defence forces and its production of armaments.

9. Similar proposals should likewise be put before the Commonwealth Prime Ministers at their meeting in London on January 4.

10. Following the meetings of the North Atlantic Council and of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers, the United States should call a meeting of the Organization of American States in order to try to secure from the Latin American republics the utmost possible assistance in the task of preparing the democratic world against the possibility of a world war in 1951.

11. Similarly the North Atlantic powers which are members of the Council of Europe should call a special meeting of the Council in order to try to bring in Sweden, Ireland, Switzerland, Greece and Turkey. Yugoslavia should also be invited to this meeting and possibly Israel and the members of the Arab League.

12. This series of meetings should be followed by meetings of the Collective Measures Committee of the General Assembly of the U.N. in an effort to rally and organize the whole of the democratic membership of the U.N. against the imminent threat of war. The Committee should prepare recommendations to be presented to the General Assembly in March, 1951. March may be a particularly dangerous month and it might be wise to have the Assembly in session at that time.

13. At the same time as these preparations are going forward, a renewed effort should be made (a) to bring into effective operation the various plans for economic assistance to under-developed countries, especially the Colombo Plan, (b) to relieve the plight of the Arab refugees, thus diminishing a source of friction in the Middle East, and (c) to remove all the major sources of friction between India and Pakistan.

14. In order to secure the utmost moral support for their cause, the democratic nations should also make clear their warm-war aims. They should do their best to convince their own people and as many people as possible in the Cominform empire that the warm war has been forced on them, that they consider the warm war not as an end in itself but as a means to an end, and that that end is not the subjugation of the Cominform empire or its unconditional surrender but the creation of a world in which the Cominform empire and the free democracies can live side by side in peace — not peace without friction but peace without the threat of war.

15. It is not only a matter of warm-war aims but also of aims in peace and in war. It is necessary to form a strong anti-Cominform world alliance but this alliance cannot safely be based on mere negation. It must be protestant in that it protests and repudiates the abhorrent doctrines and practices of the Cominform empire. It must be catholic in that it re-affirms its living faith in the beliefs, the virtues, the values of the great civilizations of which we are heirs and defenders: Western Christendom, Orthodox Christendom, Islam, Hinduism, Buddhism, Confucianism and Taoism.

Memorandum by Head, American and Far Eastern Division

POSSIBLE EFFECTS IN ASIA OF THE DEFEAT IN KOREA

I

Before attempting to examine some of the problems raised by Chinese Communist intervention in Korea, it might be pertinent to hazard an assessment, necessarily tentative, on the peculiar characteristics of Chinese Communism.

(1) The Chinese Communists have always regarded themselves as orthodox Marxists; in fact, they show signs of an almost Pharisaical pride in the purity of their Marxist theory. This tends to make them rigid, pedantic and most dangerous for all concerned, self-delusory in their approach to world problems. Thus they are convinced a priori that the United States entertains imperialistic designs against the Chinese. Their theory tells them that the United States is the greatest capitalist power on earth; great capitalist powers are bound to seize other countries as colonies or intervene against native revolutions, therefore the United States must be up to this in China. Q.E.D.

(2) Though their fanatic devotion to Marxism no doubt has a touch of religious fanaticism in it, it is probably less hypocritical than that of the present rulers of the Kremlin who have exploited its dogmas as a means of popular deception and confusion. Thus both ideological considerations and certain common interests make for a closer partnership between the two. For the present, we may take it that the Russians are the senior partners in this firm, but it might be rash to assume that the Chinese Communists are completely and irrevocably in the Russian pocket. For instance, there has been some slight evidence during the past half year, namely on the question of attacking Formosa and secondly, more recently in the present phase in Korea, that the Russians may have exerted some moderating influence on the Chinese. If this is correct, it is certainly not out of any consideration for the United Nations or for the cause of peace; it may perhaps be from fear that the Chinese Communists may be getting a little too independent in their strategy and require curbing and further, it may even be that in the eyes of the Communist world, especially in Asia, the Chinese are stealing the show from their big brother. The Russians may not also wish to have Chinese independence increased notably by military victory, particularly since it may be more difficult under the terms of the Sino-Soviet Pact to count on Chinese leaders as docile instruments of purely Russian interests.

(3) There have been persistent reports that there exists under the surface, factionalism within the Chinese Communist Party. This factionalism has been kept well under control and does not take the form of open debate, but by qualified observers it is believed to take the form of "moderates" on the one part who wish to seek some modus vivendi with the Western powers, and therefore, to reduce the Chinese Communists dependency on Russia for industrial assistance, technicians and on the other, one which is prepared to follow Russia in world leadership. (There is some evidence that even within the Chinese Communist delegation to the United Nations there is, at an incipient stage, some degree of difference in view between the leader of the delegation and his assistant). Apparently, Mao tries to keep above this factionalism and maintain a certain balance but whether it could assume a significant form would depend on the degree the Western powers were successful in

(a) showing the Chinese that we entertain no aggressive designs against their country and,

(b) achieving closer diplomatic contact in the United Nations and elsewhere in which the Chinese Communists could learn something of the nature of the free world and its thinking.

Even if nothing as dramatic as Titoism should emerge, there might be some cooling in Sino-Soviet relations, with greater political independence on the part of Chinese leaders which could make the Russians pause before launching some major aggression in which they would necessarily have to count on complete Chinese loyalty to their purposes.

(4) Turning directly to the subject in hand, namely the problem of Chinese intervention in Korea, it has become apparent in the secret talks between the Chinese Communist delegation to the United Nations and other delegations friendly to us that, as was expected, the Chinese Communists attached the greatest importance to Formosa, then perhaps secondly, entrance into the United Nations. Perhaps at some later stage Korea might, therefore, become the basis of negotiations on which to discuss the other points. In view of Chinese victories in Korea we cannot expect them to have a very conciliatory frame of mind but it is just possible that they will have enough sense to see that they cannot expect to seize all of Korea and at the same time succeed by negotiations both in regard to Formosa and entry into the United Nations. If they are inclined to do any bargaining at all it would be in the first instance over Korea. It may well be that they will refuse to retreat from their maximum terms, thus making it impossible for the United States and other nations directly concerned to proceed any further in diplomatic dealings with the Chinese Communists. One point in which the Chinese Communists feel sensitive is the vulnerability of their country to naval blockade and air attack. They are particularly anxious to proceed with the economic reconstruction of the country and their intransigence might give way somewhat if they knew that a general war would in the end hurt them even more than their enemies. It is out of such considerations as these that we might look towards negotiation not, certainly, with any great expectation but at least with some feeling that the Chinese Communists, if they are not entirely victims of their own propaganda, might be made to see some reason.

II

No matter what eventually results from Chinese intervention, its scale and obvious military effectiveness is bound to have a profound influence in Asia. Other peripheral states, such as Viet Nam and Burma, will be increasingly apprehensive of their capacity to maintain security against Chinese pressure, and unless something concrete can be done to bolster their morale, they will probably be increasingly dubious of the wisdom of association with the West. In India, while Chinese action in both Korea and Tibet could result in a greater inclination to side with the West because of fear of China, there is more likely to be a strengthening of the conviction that neutrality is the desirable goal, since recent events will appear to have justified Indian apprehensions of U.S. policies. Japan is in a somewhat different position, lying off the coast and already being physically in the U.S. sphere. The fear in Japan is not of China, since China will for some time be in no position to threaten the islands directly, but of the possible consequences of a major war.

A negotiated settlement would probably have a good effect throughout the area, provided the countries in Southeast Asia were given any reason to hope that their position vis-à-vis China could be strengthened at the same time. Any relaxation of the tension would be welcomed both in Japan and India. Japan's long-run interest involves a modus vivendi, particularly in matters of trade, with China, and a settlement including some satisfaction for Peking in connection with Formosa, U.N. representation and the negotiations for a Japanese treaty would be in accord with the Indian approach from the beginning. The probable reactions in Southeast Asia are more difficult to analyze or predict. The U.S., for example, assures us that Communist occupation of Formosa would seriously undermine morale in the Philippines. Even if true, however, this might not apply to a compromise solution not involving military occupation of the island. Indonesia would probably welcome a settlement, being neutral in the present conflict and having recognized the Peking regime. Indo-China is the most complex. So far as the Viet Nam government is concerned, however, a settlement would undoubtedly be judged in the light of the degree to which it tended to increase or relax pressure from China in the form of assistance to Ho Chi-minh, and freed the West to devote more attention to the strengthening of Viet Nam. These criteria would presumably be applied by Viet Nam to any of the possible outcomes of the present situation. For instance, if the U.N. were driven out of Korea, the effect on morale in Indo-China of this final blow to Western prestige would be grave. But this might be compensated for in part by increased ability of the U.S. to supply equipment to counteract the growing power of the forces of Viet Minh.

If a negotiated settlement is impossible, and U.N. forces are driven out of Korea, the problem would then be posed in the form of the relative merits of cutting one's losses or of taking positive steps to discipline China and, if possible, undermine the Peking regime. The first course would involve little more than declaring Communist China an aggressor and cutting off all relations. The latter might go to the length of continued air attack against selected targets, particularly communications, and would include support of such resistance movements as exist in China, and the strengthening of the Nationalist forces on Formosa.

The impact of the latter course on the situation in Asia would, in our opinion, be definitely worse than cutting the losses. The effectiveness of such a course in shaking the Peking regime is doubtful, to say the least, and might serve only to consolidate China behind the People's Government. Moreover, it might well impel Peking to step up, rather than decrease, its pressure on such points as Indo-China. If air attacks were delivered on a scale sufficient materially to cut down the short-run Chinese military potential, they would almost inevitably call forth counter measures from the Soviet air force, which would face us with another dilemma.

The Japanese would almost certainly watch such a development with dismay, since it would imply the danger of counter attack on bases in Japan. The Indians would probably react most unfavourably, both because of their attitude to strategic bombing in the first place, and because the whole operation would undoubtedly appear to them an unnecessary and futile reprisal for loss of U.S. prestige in Korea. Much of the rest of South and Southeast Asia would probably take a similar view.

To conclude, we would favour, if at all possible, negotiations over Korea. But if the Chinese prove intransigent and we have no prospect other than to be driven by force of arms off the peninsula, nevertheless it would not, for the present at least, appear to be wise to commit ourselves to military operations of any sort on the Chinese mainland. In addition to the reasons adduced above, it appears highly doubtful that such operations could achieve those purposes for which the U.N. initiated its action against aggression in Korea.

Note du chef de la Direction européenne

Memorandum by Head, European Division

SECRET [Ottawa], December 9, 1950

POSSIBLE EFFECTS IN EUROPE OF A COMPROMISE SOLUTION IN KOREA

The Western powers have already lost the initiative in Korea to such an extent that it is difficult to expect a "compromise solution"; a "negotiated settlement" would still be possible, however, when the Chinese troops reach the 38th Parallel. If at that point they halt their armies, negotiations may commence at Soviet-Chinese invitation. Such a negotiated settlement would have far-reaching implications for Europe.

2. C.L. Sulzberger of the New York Times, writing from Paris on December 6, commented that the recent developments in Korea were being interpreted in Europe as a most serious blow to the prestige of the United Nations body and a further loss of confidence in the United States position in international leadership. While this might be a hasty generalization, it would appear from information already available that European countries have been profoundly affected by recent events in Korea.

3. Generally it would seem a reasonable European interpretation of the police action of the United Nations in Korea that the action has failed either because too much was asked of it or because too few forces were made available. This is naturally a bad omen for those European countries, particularly the smaller ones, whose freedom is at the mercy of Soviet or Satellite attack. It would be natural for such countries to conclude that, under similar circumstances, a similar decision would be reached at their expense. The spirit of Munich must presumably have remained more vivid in continental Europe than anywhere else. Because of an easy analogy such speculation would apply with more force to Germany.

4. For the United Kingdom particularly, which is committed in manpower and resources to the police action in Korea, recent developments can be interpreted as indicative of too heavy preponderance of United States leadership in diplomatic, military as well as political matters in United Nations affairs. This in future could translate itself in a restiveness in following United States leadership as closely as hitherto. It is in proportion that this disequilibrium could be redressed that the United Nations would regain its lost prestige in this sphere.

5. As an instrument of settlement of disputes in the Far East, the United Nations will definitely have lost its prestige in the remaining colonial European powers. It would appear to be obvious that from now on little pressure could be exerted over the French Government for example, to have the matter of Indo-China settled through the machinery of the United Nations. In a way the possible effect of a compromise solution in Korea could lead either to the stiffening of European colonial powers in the Far East (which is very doubtful) or in the acceptance, in principle if not in fact, that a communist victory in Korea brings the end of the remnants of the Far Eastern Empires closer to hand.

6. The heavy military commitments which the United States was forced to make to the Korean front during the last few months has created uneasiness in more than one European capital. They felt that Western Europe was left open to attack by the Soviet Union since most, if not all, of the United States manpower and material were being diverted to the Far East, a front which had some importance in the present struggle but which, in the minds of the Europeans, was much less important than Western Europe. Chancellor Adenauer on December 3 referred to this when he pointed out that "Russia's aim is to have the United States expend her energies, material resources, blood and the energy of her people in other campaigns such as the one against Red China, while her over-all objective in the present world situation was to capture Europe". This uneasiness, which could have been dispelled through a rapid victory of the United Nations forces in Korea, has seriously increased with recent military setbacks.

7. Within this European context a United States decision, following a compromise solution, to recall a large number of her troops from Korea for eventual posting in Europe would, generally speaking, be welcomed by the Western European countries. Present plans for defence as seen by these countries call in any event for the stationing in Europe of United States divisions which, up till now, have not been forthcoming. Western European countries continue to be over-shadowed by the massive strength of the Soviet Union which could over-run continental Europe up to the Pyrenees within three months. Their reactions are naturally more centered around their own defence and any decrease in its effectiveness leads to a possible decrease in their morale.

8. It should be emphasized here that any negotiated settlement which would not lead to the withdrawal of the greatest proportion of United States troops now serving in Korea for eventual action in Europe at the earliest possible moment would not be satisfactory to Western European powers. In this connection, any settlement whereby United States forces would be mobilized close to the 38th Parallel facing a concentration of Chinese troops in North Korea would in the eyes of Western Europe still play into Soviet hands. The only settlement, therefore, which would be militarily satisfactory from the Western European point of view would be one which would free United States troops.

9. It could be argued that in those countries like France and the United Kingdom which have military commitments of their own in the Far East, a decision taken in Washington to withdraw the majority, if not all, of its troops from Korea would weaken correspondingly the general Western defence in the Far East. A blow to United States military leadership in Korea is therefore indirectly a blow to the military establishments of the United Kingdom and France in that part of the world. In the present state of world tension, however, the defence of Western Europe is overriding even for London and Paris.

10. In the eyes of some European countries United States military leadership, i.e. General MacArthur's leadership, has been short-sighted and has led the United Nations into a most uncomfortable position. Diplomatically, it would appear that no Western European country is willing fully to support in principle the United States Administration in its policy with regard to Communist China if this policy leads to open warfare even in a disguised form. Western Europe aims at the normalization of relations with Peking not only per se, but also because they consider that most, if not all, of the Western European countries, notwithstanding their objections in principle, would probably have to stand by the United States in such an emergency. In such an emergency little active support would be forthcoming from Western Europe and the greatness of the task would weaken the United States to a point where the defence of Western Europe would become practically impossible.

11. It can therefore be assumed that at present most, if not all, of the Western European countries would welcome a settlement of the Korean crisis on a compromise basis even if the pill is bitter.

12. It is more strongly felt in Western Europe than in Washington that there is a direct link between the Chinese pressure in Korea and Soviet policy in Western Europe. The French would seem to relate this pressure more specifically to Soviet determination to prevent the rearmament of Western Germany. If this assumption is correct, the French insistence on accepting the Soviet proposals for a Four Power conference in the not too distant future is a sensible one. While such a meeting might not have been welcomed by the majority of Western European countries before the latest developments in Korea, it might be that the international climate is much more favourable now and that the French approach is shared by many. Whether this solution will be satisfactory to Western German leaders also is another matter, since the feeling in Germany has been up until now that any meeting of the Big Four could lead to their being sold down the river.

THE IMPORTANCE OF INDO-CHINA

1. One question which may have to be considered in the near future is whether it is in the general Western interest to include the question of Indo-China in any negotiations with the Chinese which may take place over Korea or in subsequent negotiations should the first set of negotiations lead to a settlement of the Korean, Formosan and related problems.

2. The obvious danger is that if the situation in Indo-China is allowed to drift, the Western world may suffer a defeat there similar to that which it has suffered in Korea. Moreover, the arguments based on global strategy which have led us and our friends to the conclusion that it is dangerous to permit a large diversion of the limited available Western forces to the Korean theatre of operations apply also to Indo-China.

3. It may therefore be that careful consideration should be given to the possibility of reaching an agreement with China on the question of Indo-China. The agreement might be drawn up by the Council of Five Foreign Ministers; there would be pledges of non-aggression against Indo-China and pledges to go to war if overt aggression took place. The war contemplated would be an air and naval war against China and not a land war in the direct defence of Indo-China.

4. Such an agreement would undoubtedly mean the coming into power in Indo-China of a government in which the local Indo-Chinese communists would be full partners, if not dominant. This is the sort of proposal which Mr. Nehru has made for a year or more. We would have to depend on the strength of Indo-Chinese nationalism to defend Indo-China against the coming into power of a government which would be a satellite of China. We would also be protected to some extent against this contingency by the fact that Indo-China has traditionally, like the rest of South-East Asia, been a debatable ground between the Indian and the Chinese civilizations. Japan is another balancing factor.

SOME GUIDES TO IMMEDIATE ACTION

The purpose of this memorandum is to list the comparatively few things which seem to me to be clear amid all the confusion.

(a) In the event of a cease-fire we cannot agree that United Nations forces should be immediately withdrawn from Korea. Even if the Chinese Communists were prepared to offer in exchange that they would withdraw their forces from Korea and would permit the holding of elections throughout the whole of Korea under United Nations auspices, withdrawal of United Nations forces would leave the Republic of Korea at the mercy of the Communists; and this would be immediately apparent throughout the world. Agreement to withdraw United Nations forces would, therefore, be on all fours with the appeasement arranged at Munich. It would mark not only a military defeat but also a moral surrender and would, in my opinion, depress our friends throughout the world and encourage our enemies much more than a military evacuation effected under duress. It would also be difficult to the point of impossibility to explain such a surrender to the North American public who have been told by their Governments that resistance to armed aggression wherever it occurs is essential and indeed that this is one of the central purposes of the United Nations.

(b) The same line of reasoning leads to the conclusion, I think, that if the United States insists on having the United Nations declare China the aggressor in Korea, we cannot resist that request, particularly if, as now seems probable, Chinese forces cross the 38th Parallel. Nevertheless it would still be worthwhile to try to dissuade the Administration from pressing the United Nations to convict China of aggression.

(c) It would certainly be a mistake to reinforce the United Nations forces now in Korea by the despatch of any new formations and probably a mistake even to try and stiffen them by the despatch of any substantial number of reinforcements to be fed into the existing formations. Already we are over-committed in Korea in view of the military weakness in Europe. A withdrawal necessitated by overwhelming military opposition should perhaps actually be welcomed on strategic grounds.

(d) The consequences of becoming involved in war with China would be so disastrous that there should be no further talk of using the atom bomb against Chinese cities or even of permitting bombing of any kind north of the border between Korea and Manchuria.

(e) The shock of the stunning military defeat which the United States and the United Nations have suffered in Korea should be sufficient to bring home the necessity of much more rapid military preparation in Canada. But no opportunity should be lost of speeding up this realization.

(f) Experience in Korea has shown that under present circumstances unlimited collective security everywhere may mean no genuine security anywhere. This arises, first, from the fact that the number of danger spots to be defended demand far greater military forces than the Western powers now possess. It also arises, however, from the fact that most of the threatened areas — Indo-China, Iran, Turkey, Yugoslavia — lie around the circumference of the Eurasian land-mass. Once forces are committed to battle in any of these areas it is difficult to disengage them. In order to re-establish stability they are led, almost inevitably, further and further. The point then comes when a choice must be made between (1) pressing in from the circumference to the vast stretches of Eurasia, where a decision could never be reached by the use of conventional armaments, (2) using the atomic bomb or (3) withdrawing, perhaps as the result of a rout as is happening in Korea. There is properly great reluctance to sanction the use of the atomic bomb, and particularly against targets in Asia. Nevertheless, the fact must be recognized that these threatened areas cannot be prevented from falling under Soviet domination unless the Western powers are prepared to use the atomic bomb. Moreover, it must be recognized that even the use of the atomic bomb on one of the satellites, on China for example, even if such use were sanctioned, might not prove decisive, since in China at least important targets are few, lives are cheap and available manpower relatively inexhaustible. It, therefore, seems that, if these peripheral countries are to be defended, some circuit must be rigged up so that a Soviet-inspired attack on any one of them would lead to an atomic bombardment of Russian strong points. This has already been done in the case of the countries of Western Europe through the North Atlantic Treaty. It is essential that consideration should be given at once to how the same effect may be secured, perhaps by entirely different means, in order to defend the other countries in Eastern Europe, the Middle East and South-East Asia that I have mentioned.

At the same time it must be decided which of these countries are essential for our security. My own feeling is that none of them can be sacrificed without running the risk of losing before long the whole of the Eurasian land-mass to Soviet imperialism. Even if one or other of these countries proved not to be vital to our security I doubt whether we could allow any of them to fall under Soviet control with impunity. The effect on other countries open to Soviet or Soviet-inspired pressure would be so demoralizing that it might easily prove impossible to hold the situation anywhere. In any case, I think that the problems I have crudely sketched in these two paragraphs should be examined as a matter of urgency.

POINTS TO BE CLARIFIED AFTER THE ATTLEE-TRUMAN TALKS

At an early stage in the talks, Mr. Truman said that he wished to put it on record that he could not consent to any "voluntary withdrawal" of United Nations forces from Korea; and in the course of the conversations, Mr. Attlee apparently agreed with this determination. The point that requires clarification is whether or not this means that in the event of a cease-fire, the United States and the United Kingdom could not agree to the immediate withdrawal of United Nations forces from Korea, even if the Chinese Communists were prepared to offer in exchange that they would withdraw their forces from Korea and would permit the holding of elections throughout the whole of the country under United Nations auspices. This point is clearly of some importance since it would determine whether or not the two countries could consider the terms which Chinese Communists have offered for a settlement in Korea itself. My own personal opinion (as you can see from the attached memorandum) is that we could not accept this particular condition without jeopardizing the whole moral position of the United Nations. There is considerable difference of opinion on this score within the Department; and indeed I think that I am in the minority. In any case, the point is worth trying to clear up, I think. If you wish to attach your enquiry to some section of the communiqué, the relevant passage reads as follows:

"The United Nations forces were sent into Korea on the authority and at the recommendation of the United Nations. The United Nations has not changed the mission which it has entrusted to them and the forces of our two countries will continue to discharge their responsibilities. We were in complete agreement that there can be no thought of appeasement or of rewarding aggression, whether in the Far East or elsewhere. Lasting peace and the future of the United Nations as an instrument for world peace depend upon strong support for resistance against aggression."

The telegrams† from Washington showed, however, as you will remember, that Mr. Truman at least was much more categorical on this point.

2. It was agreed that the military dispositions and decisions to be taken in Korea must be largely determined by the danger threatening other exposed areas and by the present military weakness of the free world. There is no question, as I understand it, of additional military formations under any circumstances being despatched to Korea. On the other hand, this point seemed to me to be somewhat blurred by the promise which Mr. Attlee subsequently gave to keep up to strength the United Kingdom formations at present in Korea. Clearly, an obligation to reinforce existing formations might at a time of heavy casualties be almost as onerous as an obligation to send additional formations. This point is of general importance in a consideration of our overall strategic dilemma. Moreover, it is of particular importance to Canada, I think, since it might have close bearing on the issue as to whether or not the Second Battalion of the Patricias are at once committed to battle in Korea.

3. There are other and broader issues on which you will no doubt wish to seek clarification. But I hardly need to list them here. The scope of possible negotiations with the Chinese Communists and the way in which decisions about the use of the atomic bomb should be made are perhaps the two most obvious subjects on which further information would be valuable. I understand, however, that Mr. Attlee intends to speak to Mr. St. Laurent privately on the second of these two subjects.[76]

Extract from Cabinet Conclusions

VISIT OF THE PRIME MINISTER OF THE UNITED KINGDOM

1. The Prime Minister welcomed Mr. Attlee and suggested he should feel free to say anything he felt he could concerning the international situation and the measures that might be taken to meet it.

2. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom said he had had in mind, for some time, the desirability of a meeting with President Truman. This intention had been put into effect when it appeared there was some possibility of misunderstanding over the situation in Korea. At the meeting the whole position had been reviewed. He asked Field Marshal Sir William Slim to outline the military situation.

3. The Chief of the Imperial General Staff[77] said the military position had improved and what first appeared likely to become a disaster now appeared rather less serious. The advance by U.N. forces had met a much stronger resistance than had been expected. The Chinese Communist forces had thrown the main weight of their counter-attack in the centre between the two areas of principal U.N. strength — on the north-east and north-west. Great danger had developed on the right flank where a number of divisions had been cut off. Withdrawal was now in progress to the area of Hamhung. The original plan had been to hold bridgeheads at Hamhung and also in the Seoul-Inchon area. Hamhung would not now be held and U.N. forces would be removed by sea and taken south along with as much equipment as possible. The Seoul-Inchon bridgehead would not be retained indefinitely and forces there would retire, under pressure, down the peninsula toward a defensive line well north of the Pusan perimeter of the earlier period. The U.S. Commanders were confident that, with the troops they now had and those in sight, they would be able to hold such a line indefinitely. This was considerably better than the position had appeared a few days previously.

The U.N. forces had lost a great deal of equipment in the retreat and casualties had been substantial. Lengthening lines of communication could be expected to slow up the Chinese forces somewhat but it would be easy to over-estimate the damage that could be inflicted on them by air attack.

4. Mr. Attlee said that, in the first stages of the military setback, the U.K. government had thought there was danger of precipitate action while the situation was still fluid — action which might lead to a world war or at any rate to a war with China. The United Kingdom had regarded the maintenance of the authority of the United Nations as of primary importance. The organization could not afford to fail in the first real challenge of aggression. On the other hand, it was felt it would be equally fatal to pour the resources of the democratic nations into a war with China which would leave the Soviet Union free to act in Europe. In the discussion at Washington it became clear that the U.S. administration was in complete agreement.

If the democratic countries were not to become involved in a full war with China, it was clear that at some point the opposing forces would have to negotiate. Here there were differences of view between the United Kingdom and the United States. Most members of the U.S. administration appeared to regard China as a satellite of the Kremlin with no more freedom of action than the countries of Eastern Europe. The U.K. authorities thought that, while the men at the head of the Chinese government were undoubtedly genuine communists, there was not yet reason to believe they were complete Stalinists. There was a strong tradition of opposition to foreign influence in China and the United Kingdom thought it would be an error to write off the Chinese government as completely dominated by Moscow. If there was least a possibility that an independent line might be taken, the western policy should be to try to divide the two communist countries.

The United Kingdom and the United States differed with regard to the seating of the Chinese communist government at the United Nations. It seemed a mistake not to have given them a seat long before. It would be much harder now and admission could only follow some change on the Chinese part.

The U.S. government felt strongly about Formosa, partly because in 1941 the Philippines had been over-run from that island. On the other hand, the Chinese considered Formosa was equally a pistol aimed at them. It was not possible to say, at this stage, what should be or might be done.

There had been some suggestion, already echoed in the press, of the possibility of a "limited" war against China — bombing had been mentioned by some and more generally the possibility of naval blockade of the coast, economic sanctions, etc. The U.K. government felt that little, if anything, would be accomplished by limited action as long as it remained limited. Such a policy appeared likely to lead nowhere but to full-scale war with China.

In general, the United Kingdom view was that the military situation in Korea should be maintained as well as possible and lines stabilized. There should be no great impatience to come to decisions while the situation remained fluid. Once some stability had been achieved, there should be an effort to arrange a cease fire and negotiations should begin. They felt it would be an error to let a situation develop in which it would be necessary for the United Nations to name China as an aggressor. While there were points of disagreement with the United States, they should not be allowed to appear out of proportion to the large sub-stratum of agreement: that there should be no war with China; that some settlement should be arrived at in Korea; and that Asia should not be allowed to assume pre-eminence over Europe in the general picture.

There was full agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States as to the urgent need to build up North Atlantic defences. The difference of view on German re-arming had set the Organization back considerably. It appeared, however, that it would now be possible to get a Commander-in-Chief appointed and then to go forward at an accelerated rate in building up western forces.

There had been some discussion of the importance to the United Kingdom of securing support from the United States to meet the burden that would be thrust on the British by the greatly increased defence costs. The U.S. appeared to appreciate the U.K. difficulties.

The opportunity had also been used to discuss raw materials and to point out that production in the United Kingdom would be seriously hampered unless something were done to ensure that certain essential raw products could be made available in freer supply. It was agreed that, as a first step, a committee should be established consisting of representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States and France to examine the position of particular raw materials now in short supply and to suggest means for improving their distribution. At a later stage, it was thought that additional bodies might be established to deal with the production and distribution of specific raw materials. It was thought that there should be representatives on these bodies of all the countries most directly concerned. It was essential to take action quickly if re-armament and production generally were not to be seriously hampered.

5. Mr. Attlee mentioned further that the President's recent remark concerning the use of the atomic bomb was apparently an unpremeditated answer to a question at a press conference. He had evidently never seriously considered use of the bomb in Korea. While the agreement reached in 1945 during the tripartite discussions on atomic energy had not specified prior consultation with the United Kingdom and Canada, Mr. Truman appeared so strongly aware of the necessity of a joint effort against communism that he was unlikely to do anything that would lessen the cooperation between the western powers.

Generally speaking, his conversations with Mr. Truman had been frank and full and conducted in an atmosphere of utmost friendliness. They were determined to stand together in support of the United Nations and in building up the strength of the North Atlantic area. It had been agreed that it was of vital importance to have the Asiatic countries stand with the United Nations. It would be fatal if Asia were separated from the other democratic countries of the world. The Commonwealth provided a good example of Asiatic participation with eastern countries on a basis of equality.

The conference appeared to have been useful in building up public confidence and providing a general steadying effect.

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that there had been a reassuring interim reply to the Canadian note to the U.S. government on the use of the atomic bomb. It appeared that the consultation referred to in the communiqué issued by the President and the Prime Minister included Canada but no specific reference had been made to this as the communiqué dealt only with conversations between two governments.

7. Mr. St-Laurent felt that, while it was difficult for the President to make hypothetical commitments with regard to the use of the bomb, it seemed certain that he was as anxious as was the Canadian government that it should not be used and that it would be particularly unfortunate if it were used for a second time in Asia. The majority of Americans appeared to realize that the United Nations must keep the confidence and support of her partners and in order to do this must take into consideration their points of view.

8. Mr. Attlee thought that, while there were differences in policy between the United Kingdom and the United States, the underlying unity was so great and so fully recognized that it provided an adequate basis on which they could continue to act together. A number of the questions on which they did not see eye to eye were still in a contingent and hypothetical stage and might not have to be resolved for some time to come.

9. Mr. Pearson said that he was concerned that some of these questions which now seemed hypothetic would become very present and actual questions in a matter of days. For instance, the question of Formosa was now on the agenda of the U.N. Assembly and might become a subject of discussion by next week. It was hoped that the United States would withdraw the resolution. If instead they pushed it, this would have the effect of putting the United Nations behind the situation in Formosa. While it was agreed by all that the United Nations must not fail, it was sometimes difficult to decide what constituted failure. Certainly the abandonment of Korea without negotiations could constitute failure. If, on the other hand, the resolution calling on the Chinese to withdraw from Korea was passed and if the latter ignored it and chose to attack in force the new line that it was hoped could be established in Korea, then the United Nations might be placed in a precarious position.

10. Mr. Attlee said that as long as the line in Korea was held there could be no question of failure.

11. Mr. Pearson agreed but was concerned that the United States would not be content to hold the line in the face of heavy attacks, and might press for some other action.

12. Field Marshal Sir William Slim said that he did not think there was a possibility at present of any precipitate action such as bombing bases in Manchuria. While it was true that the present immunity of China to air attack from U.N. forces gave a certain military advantage, the most reliable intelligence indicated that, if the United Nations were to carry out bombing raids in China, the Russian Air Force would intervene and the advantages gained would be vastly outweighed by the disadvantages consequent upon such intervention.

13. Mr. Pearson mentioned that he had not been thinking so much of bombing but rather the possibility of the Americans following the present resolution in the United Nations with another and stronger one calling for the imposition of sanctions of some sort.

He had noted in the communiqué a reference to the impossibility of voluntary withdrawal and wondered exactly what was meant by this.

14. Mr. Attlee said that this referred to abandonment of Korea and was not intended to include a negotiated withdrawal. For instance, if the Asian delegations at Lake Success produced proposals which would include the withdrawal of Chinese and U.N. troops from Korea, leaving some sort of police force under U.N. auspices and providing for U.N. supervised elections, this would not be considered under the terms of the communiqué as "voluntary withdrawal". He pointed out there could not be dictation as to what kind of future government there would be in Korea.

15. Mr. St-Laurent agreed that it had never been intended to impose any form of government on the Koreans. The United Nations had intervened because imposition by force of a government by one section on another could not be tolerated. He enquired if there had been any indication recently of increased Russian activity in Europe.

16. Sir William Slim said that he did not believe so but that while there would probably be some preliminary indication of large scale troop movements, the Russians, if they wished, could actually overrun Western Europe with the forces that they already had in Europe.

17. Mr. St. Laurent, in thanking Mr. Attlee and Sir William Slim for the very useful information they had given members of the Canadian Government, said that he felt the talks between the U.K. Prime Minister and the President of the United States had done much to give the members of the free world confidence and comfort.

Minister, Embassy of United States, to Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET Ottawa, December 12, 1950

Dear Escott [Reid]:

Following our conversation last evening, I am pleased to send you herewith the text of the circular telegram[78] which I showed you and which the Ambassador showed to Mr. Pearson the previous evening. My Government feels that it is not possible to plan far ahead in the present Korean situation, but that certain decisions can now be made, and this message represents the current state of thinking in the Department of State.

"President and Prime Minister communiqué[79] makes it clear that there is no thought of appeasement, that aggression must be resisted and that peoples of world, acting through U N must decide how principles of Charter can best be maintained.

"The action in U N that we will seek and tempo of U N action will to a large extent depend on possibility to mobilize and maintain unity of free world and their determination to stand firmly against aggression. Leadership that we must provide toward this end must be in such a way and at such speed as will carry with us a willing and resolute community of nations.

"Action in U N

"(1) Cease fire:

"We have not asked for cessation of hostilities in Korea and have not encouraged others to initiate move for cease fire. We will of course accept cease fire if agreed to by Chinese Commies but we will not agree at price of political strings or other dishonourable conditions. If cease fire is achieved we are prepared agree to discussion of Korean question with Chinese Commies in appropriate forum with view to peaceful settlement. We cannot of course commit ourselves to substance of our position on any questions that may be involved in such negotiations.

"(2) Six-Power Resolutions:

"At present U S is pressing in political committee of G A Six-Power Resolution which was vetoed by Soviets in S C. This Resolution sponsored in G A by same six powers does not brand Chinese Commies as aggressors, but calls upon them to get out of Korea. Resolution also affirms that it is policy of U N to hold present frontier with Korea inviolate and fully protect legitimate Chinese and Korean interests in frontier zone.

"So long as Chinese Commies are pressing their offensive against U N forces in Korea, adoption by G A of Six-Power Resolution is minimum action that must be taken. This Resolution, when overwhelmingly voted by G A, would re-assert unity of free world against aggression and in support of U N action in Korea. It would underline principle of "uniting for peace" Resolution, that Soviet cannot by veto make U N impotent. Failure of U N to take action would destroy its authority and its support among peoples of world, and particularly people of U S.

"We believe we must carry forward momentum in bringing this Resolution to a vote in Committee and G A plenary and not permit unwarranted delays. At same time we do not want to move so fast that other members will have basis believe that any opportunity for U N processes have been precluded. According to our present estimate the Committee should reach vote on Dec. 12 or, unless some indication of readiness for settlement by Chinese Commie, at latest December 13.

"If cease fire is agreed to we are of course prepared to suspend action on Six-Power Resolution in G A pending outcome of any discussions or negotiations that may follow cease fire.

"If hostilities continue we will continue fight in Korea in order discharge our responsibilities in accordance S C and G A Resolution. If Chinese Commies press their attack below 38th parallel in effort to drive U N forces into sea, further action by U N after adoption Six-Power Resolution will be necessary. In light of appeal from Asiatic States we believe crossing 38th parallel by Chinese Commies should be treated as new and flagrant demonstration of aggression and evil design of reprehensible Chinese Commie leaders. In such circumstances high hope of peaceful settlement in Korea gone, reasons for treading softly and maintaining mild and conciliatory tone in U N will have largely disappeared. We will therefore seek support of nations which approved original U N action in Korea for resolution to brand Chinese Commies as aggressors. Since U N branded N K as aggressors in June, it could do no less with regard to Chinese Commies who are committing aggression not only against ROK but also against U N forces, and are also flouting authority of U N.

"We are still considering what other U N action should be called for in such later resolution and we do not wish make that decision at this time in light uncertain military situation. We would welcome views of other U N members."

Sincerely yours,

DON C. BLISS

2. Following is the text of the two draft resolutions being submitted by Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, Saudi-Arabia, Syria and Yemen.

FIRST DRAFT RESOLUTION

"The General Assembly,

VIEWING with grave concern the situation in the Far East,

CONSIDERING that the continuance of this situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of world peace and security, RECOMMENDS that the representatives of the following Governments, namely _____ , shall as soon as possible meet and make recommendations for the peaceful settlement of existing issues in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations."

SECOND DRAFT RESOLUTION

"The General Assembly,

VIEWING with grave concern the situation in the Far East,

ANXIOUS that immediate steps should be taken to prevent the conflict in Korea spreading to other areas and to put an end to the fighting in Korea itself and that further steps should then be taken for a peaceful settlement of existing issues in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations,

REQUESTS the President of the General Assembly to constitute a group of three persons including himself to determine the basis on which a satisfactory cease-fire in Korea can be arranged and to make recommendations to the General Assembly as soon as possible."

In addition, the Philippines are also co-sponsors of the second resolution.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

INTERVENTION OF THE CENTRAL PEOPLE'S GOVERNMENT OF THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA IN KOREA

1. At the outset of yesterday morning's meeting of the First Committee, Rau introduced two draft resolutions, the texts of which were transmitted to you in my teletype No. 629. These represented the results of the secret meetings held during the last two or three days by their sponsors. At the beginning of his statement, Rau gave the substance of his four lengthy conversations with Wu, the object of which, as he put it, was "to understand the point of view of the Peking Government in respect of the Korean and other connected issues, and to make certain proposals for its consideration." According to Rau, Wu assured him in one of these conversations that his Government did not wish a war with the United Nations or the United States, but that it found that because the forces of the United States and the United Nations were carrying on operations near its border a war had been forced upon it. This led Rau to say that the Peking Government "seemed to be moving toward a kind of Monroe Doctrine for China", considering that any foreign intervention in any territory adjoining China was an unfriendly act. It was upon the premise that the Chinese Communists desired a peaceful settlement and that the "rest of us" also desired such a peaceful settlement "if it can be achieved on just and honourable terms", that the first resolution (A/C1/641) was based. Rau pointed out that although he would have preferred it, the resolution does not impose a cease fire, but leaves the determination of a suitable basis for any cease fire order to the President of the Assembly and to two other persons of his choice, after which it was up to the General Assembly to recommend whether such an order should be issued on the terms recommended.

2. With regard to the second resolution, Rau merely said that the Governments to form the Committee had been left unspecified as, in his view, they should be determined by the Committee itself. He went on, however, to list the Governments which, he thought, should be represented. These were the Peking Government, for obvious reasons; France, the United Kingdom and the United States as being among the sponsors of the six-Power resolution (A/C1/638); U.S.S.R. as sponsor of the resolution A/C1/640 and Egypt and India as being among the sponsors of the present resolution.

3. Finally, Rau asked that the draft resolution concerning the cease fire be given priority, and after a brief discussion this was agreed to by 48 votes in favour, 5 against (the Soviet bloc) and 4 abstentions. The Canadian delegation voted in favour.

4. In the debate which ensued, both the United Kingdom and the United States made brief statements. Younger said that he would support the thirteen-nation proposal as a cease fire was a necessary pre-requisite to the settlement of the Korean question and would be consistent with the aims of the United Nations to achieve its aims by peaceful means. He did not think that by adopting such a proposal the United Nations would in any way be going back on the principle for which it was fighting. Austin also supported the draft resolution, but reminded the Committee that the execution of a cease fire order would of necessity have to be followed by supervision. The cease fire order, however, would be the prelude to a pacific settlement, and for this reason he favoured the proposal. Tsiang criticized the draft on the grounds that it would ask the policeman to lay down his arms at the same time as the gangsters and thought that its adoption would be a blow to the United Nations. On the other hand, it was consistent with the principle of the United Nations and he urged that it be welcomed and implemented by all concerned.

5. Because of the debate in plenary on atomic energy no meeting was held in the afternoon, but the debate will resume today.

TOP SECRET

Reference: My Despatch No. 3144 of December 7th, 1950.

VIEWS OF THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ON POSSIBLE USE OF ATOMIC WEAPONS IN THE FAR EAST

1. Since the conclusion of the talks between President Truman and Mr. Attlee, the State Department has undertaken, through Mr. R.G. Arneson, to clarify the meaning and intent of the results of the Truman-Attlee discussions in so far as they concerned the use of atomic weapons. Reference to this question is contained in the penultimate paragraph of the Joint Communiqué issued on Friday, December 8th, which included the following paragraph:

"The President stated that it was his hope that world conditions would never call for the use of the atomic bomb. The President told the Prime Minister that it was also his desire to keep the Prime Minister at all times informed of developments which might bring about a change in the situation."

In a further interview between Mr. Arneson and Mr. Ignatieff, Mr. Arneson, on authority of the Secretary of State, gave Mr. Ignatieff a letter (two copies of which are attached) in which he was authorized to state that "the Canadian Government is in the same position with respect to the foregoing as is the United Kingdom Government".

2. Mr. Arneson also furnished some further light on what passed between the United States and United Kingdom delegations during the Truman-Attlee talks on the question of the possible use of atomic weapons, and this is contained in a further memorandum of conversation, two copies of which are attached.

3. The interpretation placed by Mr. Arneson on the language of the Communiqué does not seem to me to meet the views put to the President by Mr. Attlee and also put to the Department of State in the Canadian Memorandum of December 6th. Mr. Attlee, however, has declared himself to be "completely satisfied" with the assurances given him by Mr. Truman during his visit. I therefore thought it well to consult the British Ambassador today, and he has given me, on a personal basis, an account of the discussions last week on this subject. He asked me not to report what he had said to me unless I was sure that it was necessary so that you and the Prime Minister might understand the position. I assume that Mr. Attlee during his visit to Ottawa explained the situation to the Prime Minister, and I therefore shall not report the information given me by Sir Oliver Franks unless you request me to do so.

4. My Despatch No. 3144 of December 7th contained the notation that a copy was being referred to the Canadian Delegation in New York. This copy was in fact given personally to Mr. Pearson in Washington on December 7th or 8th, and it will not be included in the files of the Canadian Delegation. I am therefore not referring a copy of this despatch to the Delegation.

TOP SECRET [Washington], December 11, 1950

Memorandum of conversation between Mr. R.G. Arneson, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State on Atomic Energy, and Mr. G. Ignatieff, December 11, 1950.

Mr. Ignatieff saw Mr. Arneson again on December 11th to follow up the talk which took place on December 6th, when he gave Mr. Arneson a copy of the Memorandum containing the views of the Canadian Government on the possible use of atomic weapons in the Far East.

The conversation on December 11th took place at the request of Mr. Arneson, as he said that he was in a position to give certain written comments on the questions discussed with Mr. Ignatieff on December 6th. Mr. Arneson opened the conversation by recalling that the Canadian Government Memorandum stated in particular that there should be consultation among the governments principally concerned before a decision to use the atomic bomb was made. He had now been authorized by the Secretary of State to give a written statement of the U.S. Government's position on this question in the light of understandings reached between Mr. Truman and Mr. Attlee during their meetings in Washington. The text of the written statement given to Mr. Ignatieff is contained in a letter dated December 11th, a copy of which is attached.

Mr. Arneson said that he had also been authorized by the Secretary of State to give a verbal explanation of this understanding. He also undertook to give Mr. Ignatieff an account of how the penultimate paragraph, referring to the discussion between President Truman and Mr. Attlee on the use of the atomic bomb, came to be inserted in the joint communiqué on December 8th.

He explained that Mr. Attlee had raised the question of consultation between the U.K. and U.S. Governments before atomic weapons are used, in a private meeting at which no others were present. No written statement of the U.S. position passed between President Truman and Mr. Attlee. Mr. Arneson explained that the "statement" to which he had referred in his conversation with Mr. Ignatieff on December 6th was a United States "position paper" for the use of the United States participants in the Attlee-Truman talks, and had not been given to the United Kingdom delegation. When the joint communiqué of the Attlee-Truman talks came to be drafted on December 8th, Sir Roger Makins, who was the U.K. representative on the drafting group, suggested a reference to the verbal exchange between President Truman and Mr. Attlee, in terms which, in the opinion of Mr. George Perkins (the U.S. representative on the group), seemed to go beyond the United States position as stated in the U.S. "position paper". A meeting was hurriedly called at the White House between U.S. officials concerned, at which Messrs. Acheson, Lovett, Harriman, Snyder, and Arneson were present. It was decided to recommend to President Truman that an agreed text should be included concerning the use of atomic weapons in the joint communiqué to avoid the possibility of any misunderstanding arising in the future. A text was submitted to President Truman. After approving it, the President suggested that Mr. Acheson should see Mr. Attlee and Sir Oliver Franks personally to obtain their concurrence. With minor alterations, the language used in the joint communiqué was agreed to in this manner.

Mr. Arneson went on to explain that the language so used was the only authoritative record of what had been agreed between President Truman and Mr. Attlee on this question. The decision to make this understanding public was due to the fact that there was some apprehension on the part of the President and his advisers that some misunderstanding might arise, particularly in the Congress, on what assurance President Truman had in fact given to Mr. Attlee in their private conversation. In the Blair House meetings called by President Truman a year ago last summer, for the purpose of consulting with the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy before the tripartite discussions were resumed in the fall of last year, the President had given assurance to the congressional representatives that there would be no secret commitment made to any foreign government without prior consultation with and the consent of the Joint Congressional Committee. Mr. Arneson also recalled the strong objections expressed in the Joint Congressional Committee, when it was consulted on the negotiations leading to the modus vivendi of 1947-48, when the question came up of renewing the undertaking contained in the Quebec Agreement that the United States would seek the consent of Canada and the United Kingdom before using atomic weapons. Mr. Arneson explained that it was the considered view of the United States Administration that there could be no return to the position stated in the Quebec Agreement.

He said that the State Department wished to make it quite clear that what the President had undertaken to do in respect of Prime Minister Attlee, and would be prepared to do in respect of the Prime Minister of Canada, was to consult on the conditions or circumstances which might in the future give rise to a situation in which the atomic bomb might be used. The Administration could not undertake a commitment which would bind it to obtain the prior consent of any other government before atomic weapons are used. The language included in the joint communiqué had, in fact, enabled the President to inform the Joint Congressional Committee on December 11th, that it was the President's understanding that the United States Government had not relinquished in any way its power of decision to use atomic weapons.

Mr. Arneson concluded the conversation by referring again to the remarks which he had made to Mr. Ignatieff on December 6th. He thought that the position which had now been clearly established was that the consultation between the three governments would be on the developing international situation and the military measures which it called for, rather than upon the use, in a particular situation, of atomic or any other kind of weapons.

Dear George [Ignatieff]:

In our discussion together on Wednesday afternoon December 6, 1950 you set forth the views of your Government on the question of the possible use of atomic weapons in the Far East. You stated that your Government was strongly of the view that before a decision was taken on the matter of use, there should be consultation among the Governments principally concerned.

The Joint Communiqué issued on Friday, December 8, 1950, reflecting the results of the Truman-Attlee meetings contains the following statement concerning atomic weapons:

"The President stated that it was his hope that world conditions would never call for the use of the atomic bomb. The President told the Prime Minister that it was also his desire to keep the Prime Minister at all times informed of developments which might bring about a change in the situation."

I am authorized to inform you that the Canadian Government is in the same position with respect to the foregoing as is the United Kingdom Government.

Sincerely yours,

R. GORDON ARNESON

Memorandum by Ambassador in United States

TOP SECRET [Washington], December 13, 1950

TRUMAN-ATTLEE DISCUSSIONS ON ATOMIC QUESTIONS

I showed Sir Oliver Franks this morning the record of the two discussions between Ignatieff and Arneson. I said that I thought that the account given by Arneson to Ignatieff on December 11th of what went on in the talks must be incomplete in some important respects. Although I imagined that Mr. Attlee, when he was in Ottawa, had filled in the gaps during his discussion with Mr. St. Laurent, I would welcome such information as he could give to guide me in reporting to Mr. Pearson.

Sir Oliver said that he would give me, on a personal basis, an account of what went on, with the understanding that I would be free to pass on what part of it I thought necessary in order to ensure that the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson understood the situation.

Mr. Attlee had raised the matter with Mr. Truman in a private conversation before one of the meetings and had particularly requested that there should be consultation with the United Kingdom and Canada before any decision was taken to employ atomic weapons. Mr. Truman had given him verbally a full assurance in the sense desired. The advisers were then called in and Mr. Truman repeated this assurance in their presence. The assurance of prior consultation had been written into the first drafts of the Communiqué and had not been questioned on the U.S. side during several revisions of these drafts. On the last day of the meetings, however, while Mr. Attlee and the British party were waiting for the final approval of the Communiqué, Mr. Acheson called Mr. Attlee and Sir Oliver into the President's office and explained why it was undesirable that the Communiqué should include a commitment for prior consultation, for reasons similar to those given Mr. Ignatieff by Mr. Arneson. He added that he was sure that it would prejudice the prospects of a successful resumption of the tripartite negotiations if the language of the Communiqué were not changed. He then produced a draft of his own, which was so reserved in language that Sir Oliver said that it sounded minatory instead of reassuring. Finally, they worked out the language employed in the Communiqué.

Sir Oliver said, however, that the verbal assurances given in very explicit terms by the President were not withdrawn and that therefore the phrase used, "to keep the Prime Minister at all times informed of developments which might bring about a change in the situation," really meant that there would be prior consultation with the Governments of the United Kingdom and Canada before a decision was taken to employ atomic weapons.

Mr. Attlee's endeavour is to stick to the line that his discussions with the President on this point were, as he said in Parliament yesterday, completely satisfactory without giving his interpretation of this passage in the Communiqué. Sir Oliver thinks it likely that he has informed Mr. Churchill in strict confidence of what actually transpired, and he hopes that Mr. Churchill will therefore use his influence to prevent further pressure on Mr. Attlee in the House of Commons.

CONFIDENTIAL

Repeat Washington No. 83.

1. The joint draft resolution presented by thirteen Asian countries providing for the establishment of a committee of three persons to determine the basis of a cease fire was passed in the First Committee on December 13th by 51 votes in favour, 5 against (the Soviet Bloc) with China abstaining. It is the first vote on the Korean issue in which the initiative has been taken by the Asian countries themselves and in which the Asian, Middle Eastern, and Western Powers, as well as Yugoslavia, have been lined up solidly together. The initiative throughout in the preparation of this resolution was taken by India and the leadership of India seems to have been accepted naturally by the others with the exception of Romulo. Thailand and Turkey, both of which have strong views about taking any action which might imply a compromise in any way with Communist forces, did not join the other Asian countries, but voted in favour of the resolution.

2. Up until the last moment there seemed to be serious difficulties. The original intention had been to present a single resolution providing for negotiations after the cease fire had taken effect. This original draft was accepted by the United Kingdom, but Romulo opposed it as unacceptable to the United States. The Asian Group agreed then to present two resolutions, the first one containing the principle of a cease fire and the second one containing the principle of subsequent negotiations. The Philippines did not join in sponsoring the second. From the Indians we gained the original impression that they wished to pass the second resolution very shortly after the first as the second resolution was considered to be the bait which might induce Peking to accept the first. At a Commonwealth meeting Wednesday morning, however, Rau did not press this view and indicated complete agreement with the view that there could be no talk of negotiation until there had been some indication of compliance with the cease fire.

3. The discussion of the Asian resolution in Committee has been, on the part of the supporters generally, of a high order. Austin was simple and brief and unprovocative. Younger was careful to explain that although his Government was prepared for negotiation, they were not prepared to make dishonourable concessions. Some of those who ultimately supported the resolution indicated grave doubts, in particular the Turkish and Greek representatives. Santa Cruz,[80] expressing the view of a good many South Americans, said that he accepted the resolution, but without optimism.

4. Malik quickly made it clear that this proposal was not acceptable. He, and more particularly his satellite colleagues, emphasized that the United States had not wanted to cease fire when they were winning, but were anxious now to stop the fighting so that they might regroup in order to renew the attack. He effectively exploited the fact that Romulo, the American agent, had sponsored the first resolution, but not the second. He quoted from Younger, Austin and other speakers to prove that the Anglo-American Bloc wanted only a cease fire and had no serious intention of going through with the negotiations. Throughout, he was polite to the Asian countries, whom he considered to have been well-intentioned, but whose good intentions would have no results because the Americans were determined not to carry out these intentions. Malik did not at any point, however, say that even if the second resolution were accepted, his attitude toward the first would change. He reiterated that the only solution was to be found in the Soviet draft resolution calling for the withdrawal of all foreign troops. In a subsequent reply, he challenged my statement to the effect that he had excluded the Chinese "volunteers" from his provision for the withdrawal of all foreign troops by declaring that his draft resolution spoke clearly of all foreign troops. The withdrawal of the Anglo-American forces, he said, would dispose of the need for the Chinese "volunteers". It might perhaps be noted that he did not specifically equate the Chinese with the United Nations forces in Korea and might have been implying that the Chinese volunteers would not have to leave until the United Nations forces had first withdrawn.

5. Rau, in his statements, spent a good deal of time persuading doubters on the Western side that the Asian proposal was honourable and not an invitation to a bargain. He was careful to avoid provocation of either Peking or Moscow. In reply to Malik's charges of American insincerity, Rau said that he had every hope that if the first resolution was successful, the second would have an easy passage through the Assembly.

6. Sharrett of Israel in the course of the discussion tentatively put forward some of the ideas contained in the Israeli proposals made to us last Sunday (my telegram No. 616 of 11th December).† These proposals have remained in abeyance partly because of the cool reception of the United States and partly because attention has shifted to the Asian proposals. The Israelis have continued to believe, however, that their suggestions would have a better chance of appealing to the Chinese and have hoped for some support, particularly from among the Commonwealth countries.

7. The Asian resolution passed through plenary today and the President announced the names of his colleagues in the effort to arrange a cease fire, and they had a preliminary meeting this afternoon.[81] Fortunately, no time limit has been set for a report back to the Assembly by the President. Negotiation may not take long if there is a flat rejection by Peking or North Korea, but if there is any hope of success, the negotiations may well be prolonged.

8. Before the vote in Committee, there had been general agreement among the supporters of the resolution that after it had been passed, all discussions in the First Committee should be suspended. The remaining items are all related to the Far Eastern situation and could hardly be adopted successfully or in an atmosphere conducive to successful cease-fire negotiations. The intention was that although the visiting delegations would depart, the Assembly would remain in session and would be called again either in plenary or First Committee after the President had reported the results of his discussions on a cease fire. At the conclusion of Wednesday's meeting, Fawzi Bey attempted to make this understanding explicit and, of course, provoked Malik into vigorous protest. The meeting was adjourned before there was any clear understanding, but it is hoped that the Chairman will follow the timetable mentioned above.

MEMORANDUM ON KOREA

Our memorandum on Korea achieved at least three objectives. It put the Canadian view before a large number of governments as a North American view differing somewhat from that of the United States. It elicited the views of some of the governments approached. Finally it indicated our desire to consult with friendly governments on a grave issue of mutual concern. It is interesting that special mention was made to our representatives in a number of countries of the value of such consultation. It is impossible to know to what extent our views may influence the stand of other governments, although we can assume that the Canadian views were discussed in the various Foreign Offices and with their representatives in the United Nations. Generation of such discussion itself, would be an achievement not without merit.

2. We have received some 20 replies based on conversations with qualified spokesmen of the governments concerned. While it would not be wise to read too much from the necessarily limited information we have received, that information tends to confirm what we might expect the reactions of the various governments to be.

Europe

3. Replies from European capitals in general indicate their natural desire to see the principle of collective security upheld. They are concerned with the possibility of the fruitless dissipation of the limited resources of the democracies in the Far East, which although important must in the global scheme be given second priority. Their deep concern at the possibility of the outbreak of a general war is made apparent. In the main, they favour direct negotiation between the United States and China, and for that reason, would prefer not to label China as an aggressor. There was a general reluctance to express views on the question of Chinese admission to the United Nations and Formosa. (The Italian Foreign Ministry did suggest that Communist Chinese admission to the United Nations should be coupled with the admission of Italy, since such a move would serve to remove the appearance of the decision made under duress and "would not alter the present proportion of friends and adversaries of America"). Our representative in Sweden got the impression that the Foreign Office was not anxious to play an active role in the situation — an impression borne out by the rather negative stand taken by the Swedish Minister in an interview with me on December 9.

The Commonwealth

4. Divergent views were expressed in Commonwealth capitals. Entire agreement with Canadian views was found in Karachi. The Government of Pakistan was especially anxious that the war be localized and that direct negotiations with the Chinese Communists be initiated. Our views were "close to the thinking" of the Indian Government, whose views we know to include the necessity of a cease-fire followed by negotiations between the United States and China, which must include discussions of Chinese representation in the United Nations and Formosa. South Africa stressed the importance of standing firmly behind the United States. Australian officials referred us to Mr. Spender's speech of December 2, in which the main outline of Australian policy was contained, including resistance to aggression, limitation of the area of conflict and the importance of peaceful negotiation. Mr. Spender indicated in addition that consideration should be given to "the special Australian point of view as distinct from a purely European point of view" in determining action against aggression in the Far East.

5. There did not seem to be any serious disagreement with the views expressed in our memorandum, except possibly in New Zealand. Mr. Doidge said (December 4) he could not agree to "appeasement". He did not believe the issues of Chinese representation in the United Nations or the status of Formosa should be considered as bargaining points. In public statements he has expressed unqualified acceptance of United States and United Kingdom leadership — leadership which in his own words New Zealand was prepared to accept "almost blind-folded".

6. More recently (December 13), however, and perhaps partly as a result of our memorandum, the New Zealand Government has, in a note to the United States, counselled caution in taking action to brand Communist China as an aggressor. It has indicated further that it would wish to consult with other members of the Commonwealth before making any final decision as to its stand in the present crisis.

South America

7. Replies from South American officials were couched in broad terms. Their general tenor was similar to that expressed in a memorandum from the Chilean Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which read in part "Chile is disposed to ... comply faithfully with her obligations, those having reference to stipulations of the Charter of the United Nations Organization as well as those deriving from regional pacts." The Cuban Ministry of State pointed out that, since the Cuban Government was dependent to a large extent on United States sources for its information, it would be difficult for Cuba to take an "adverse attitude".

United States

8. We heard only briefly from Washington. Mr. Matthews, Assistant Secretary of State said that the State Department would agree with most of the views expressed. He believed that if it were possible to arrange a cease-fire it would be the Soviet Government which would make the real decision.

9. Summaries of a few reports of the comments of other Foreign Offices are attached.† They include only reports which throw light on the policy of the government concerned.

KOREAN CEASE-FIRE
NEGOTIATIONS AT THE UNITED NATIONS

December 15, 1950 (Friday)

The President asked the two of us, Rau and myself, to begin our "cease fire" work by lunching with him. Also present were General Crittenberger and Gross, representing the Unified Command. At lunch we discussed very informally questions of procedure — how our Committee might operate. Gross was anxious that we should not give the impression we were mediating between two conflicting parties of the same status. We assured him that we would keep that very much in mind. We were one agency of the United Nations and the Unified Command another agency of the United Nations. The other party to the conflict was an aggressor.

Gross also seemed anxious for us to finish our work as quickly as possible and report to the First Committee, which has been called to meet on Monday. Gross was of two minds as to whether, on Monday, the First Committee should start debating Formosa, or whether we should try to postpone its meetings until we had finished our "cease fire" work. Dulles apparently wanted to give his reply to Vishinsky's charge of U.S. aggression against China, which, he says, he has been prevented from giving for some time. I argued strongly for not proceeding with the agenda of the First Committee until we had finished our work on the "cease fire". Rau supported this strongly, and Entezam not so strongly. Gross indicated that there was a division in the U.S. delegation on this point.

After lunch we met in the President's office. Gross, who did most of the speaking for the Unified Command, produced a plan for a "cease fire", which would be satisfactory to the Unified Command. (See memorandum on this subject of today's date, attached as Annex I.)† We discussed this for some time, emphasizing how important it was to keep it secret at this stage. I took the position that we would not confront the Chinese formally with an agreed plan submitted to us by the Americans, but that we should indicate to the Chinese that we had received information from the Unified Command about a plan that we thought reasonable and on which they might wish to comment; or produce some ideas of their own. The Unified Command made it clear that their plan was not submitted for bargaining. Our Committee thought it to be a very reasonable and sensible arrangement, which made a good many concessions to the opposite side, such as representation on the agency for the supervising of the plan.

I asked General Crittenberger if he would tell me, for my own information, whom we should get in touch with on the other side; who was the high command in North Korea. He said the best information on that could be got from the Chinese Nationalists, who know all about the Chinese Communist generals. There is apparently, however, a Chinese Communist general who is running the whole campaign from Manchuria.

After Crittenberger and Gross had left, we discussed our further procedure and decided that we would not rush matters. We would first examine the Unified Command plan and not contact officially the Chinese Communists until we had some indication whether an official invitation to them to appear before us would be one that they could accept, or whether it might bring forth quick and final refusal. I suggested that we first send them, formally, a copy of the United Nations resolution establishing our Committee, and Rau, who was seeing them tomorrow, would then tell them unofficially that we would be glad to see them whenever they wished. But we should not rush them or put all our eggs in that particular basket. The Chinese Communists here might, in fact, have no authority to talk to us at all.

Meanwhile, the Secretary-General had joined us and he said that he had seen the Chinese Communists during the morning and that they had been very tough. They had taken up a British request, made through him, about prisoners of war, and it got a very curt and rude reception. Trygve Lie was a little depressed about all this, especially as he is not satisfied with the way in which our Committee is likely to operate. He does not think much of Benegal Rau, who, he says, does not know how to handle the Communists, or how to talk to them effectively. However, he was pleased that he had been asked to join us this afternoon, and he agreed to put at our disposal Feller and Katzin for secretarial work. He also agreed with our general line of procedure.

I suggested that after our meeting we have a press conference; that we had better let the press see us; and explain to them our difficulties. We did this and gave them a short communiqué, which I drafted. There were a good many questions, but the press, who were grateful for the conference, did not try to embarrass us.

Trygve Lie then left us to see the Chinese Communists, who had asked for an appointment at Lake Success for 5.30. Later he told me about this visit over the phone, and asked me to join Entezam and Rau at his house in Forest Hills at 9.00 p.m.

We found him excited and depressed over the afternoon meeting with the Chinese. Chiao did most of the talking at that meeting and confirmed the impression that he was the No. 1 man. They told Lie that they had already informed Sir Benegal Rau that they did not recognize our Committee and were unwilling to talk about a "cease fire", except on terms already made quite clear to Rau, who should have made them quite clear to us. Unless there were negotiations about a political settlement in Korea, the withdrawal of foreign troops, and Formosa, along lines indicated by Malik, they could not talk about any "cease fire". They used language which, according to Lie, was completely "Russian", and very much like Malik's speeches in the First Committee. They complained that they had been sitting around waiting for the question of Formosa to come up; that they had heard on the radio that the Assembly was over, so they were going home to Peking. They asked Mr. Lie, whom they thanked very warmly for all his help and courtesy, to get them "passports" and travel accommodation on a BOAC plane leaving next Tuesday, and to arrange for a press conference tomorrow, Saturday, at 3.00 o'clock, where they would make a statement. Lie said that he pleaded with them not to do this, and that he talked "very tough" with them. He told them that they were in danger of precipitating war if they broke off like this, because it would be interpreted here that the Chinese Communist Government had no interest in bringing the war in Korea to an end. He asked them to put off their press conference, and to see the Cease Fire Committee, which, he said, had been working hard all day, and which was composed of men who were doing their best to make peace. The Chinese admitted that the three men were good and trying to make peace, but said that there were other men who were not good and, therefore, there was no hope for these three! In any event, they said these great matters of peace and war would have to be decided on the highest plane. The top men should get together. Lie asked them if they meant Mao, Stalin and Truman, and they indicated that that was the kind of thing they had in mind. Lie said he kept urging them not to leave New York now, but they kept replying that they could not talk about "cease fire", as they had no instructions to discuss this resolution, which was illegal in any event. Also, their government wanted them to come back by air to Peking for the "passing over of the New Year"! They said, however, that it was very simple to go to Peking and very simple to come back if they had to. Lie was unable to make any further impression on them.

Lie then asked Rau if the Chinese had not told him their decision that morning. Rau said "no", but that they did tell him that they could not negotiate a "cease fire" arrangement unless we were willing to negotiate other things as well. Rau had pointed out to them this morning, as Lie pointed out to them this afternoon, that the "cease fire" resolution did provide for general negotiation, but only after a "cease fire" had been worked out. They did not seem to understand this part of the resolution, which Rau tried to impress on them.

Rau then phoned to see if he could go and see the Chinese tonight. They had told Lie that they were going to be in to see Mr. Truman on the television. When Rau phoned, however, he was told that they were not in, but would let Rau know in the morning whether he could see them then. If he does see them he will tell them how shocked he was to hear they were going away so soon; that we would be glad to see them before they go. Our hope was to discuss matters with them before their press conference. We agreed that if they won't see us, we must not consider that this means the end of our work, as they are merely officials of the Chinese Government. We should write them formally expressing our interest in seeing them in respect of this resolution, as representatives of their government, but adding that we would be quite willing to establish contact with their government directly in the matter, or with the North Korean military authorities. We agreed that we should also send a message direct to the Peking Government saying we had not been able to discuss these matters with their authorities here, and that we would be glad to discuss them with representatives of the Peking and North Korean Governments at any place that was mutually satisfactory.

I asked Lie whether he thought that the Chinese delegation here had lost face, and their government were recalling them merely because they had been forced to hang about. He said he did not think so.

Lie was very depressed. He said his discussion with the Chinese this evening, and their demand for transportation home, reminded him very much of his interview with the German Ambassador the night the Nazis descended on Norway. We all agreed, however, including Lie, that we must not let the attitude of the Chinese Communists here prevent us going right ahead and doing what we can by any method open to us.

Kenneth Younger had an hour's talk with the Chinese this afternoon, which he reported to Lie. Younger was also depressed by his contact. He brought his own interpreter with him, an Englishman, who said that the Chinese spoken by these people was the roughest kind of gutter language, bitter and crude.

Lie's view is that they are getting orders from not only Peking, but from Russia. As the Russians are leaving, they decided that they should leave too.

It has been a gloomy day, but I think that too much of this has been caused by the language and attitude of Wu and Company. After all, we shouldn't expect them to be polished and courteous and friendly. But apart from their methods, there is quite enough in the facts of the situation to warrant a good deal of pessimism about the results of our "cease fire" work. But at all costs, we must try everything before we admit failure.

December 16, 1950 (Saturday)

This was as interesting a day as yesterday, and about as discouraging. In the early morning, Riddell and I drafted a letter to send to the Chinese Communists before they held their press conference this afternoon. The communication is attached in final form (Annex II)† which is practically the same as that which we drafted here. I also worked on a draft of a communiqué (Annex III)† which could be given to the press after the Chinese conference, in case the Chinese statement seemed to make such a communiqué desirable. It would emphasize that flat rejection of any discussions by the Chinese Communists here did not necessarily mean the end of our work; that we must try to keep these negotiations going on, even if it means a trip to Peking! This is desirable, both on political and military grounds.

At 11.00 o'clock Entezam phoned me to see if I could join him and Rau at his suite at the Ritz Towers at noon. Rau had reported to him that his efforts to get in touch with the Chinese Communists had been unavailing. They claimed that they were too busy to meet him during the morning, but would see him that evening.

Younger came in to see me at 10.00 o'clock to report on his talk with Wu, and also to find out how things stood. He is very anxious that we should not submit a negative report on "cease fire" to the First Committee at once, as this might be followed by U.S. efforts to take further steps against the Chinese Communists. Such further steps should not, in his opinion, and in mine, be taken until there has been consultation between the governments chiefly concerned, so that we can find out exactly where they will lead us.

I met Entezam and Rau at the former's hotel at noon, and they agreed with my draft to the Chinese with one or two minor changes. We then had it typed and despatched by messenger to the Chinese at the Waldorf, having previously telephoned them that it was coming.

After luncheon we motored out to Lake Success and met in the President's office there with the Secretary-General. He said that there had been no indication of softening on the part of the Chinese, who would be arriving any minute for their press conference. We then listened, through a loud speaker in the office, to Wu read his statement to the press. It was not too bad and did not include any reference to their departure, or to their refusal to negotiate with the Cease Fire Committee. At the same time, he handed out to the press a long statement which he would have made in the First Committee on Formosa and U.S. aggression against China, if he had been permitted to do so. (Annex IV).† What they are trying to do is show that they have been prevented from making such a statement because of changes of procedure on the part of the First Committee. These tactics do not, however, square with the fact that the First Committee will meet on Monday, and may possibly even decide to discuss Formosa. Lie said that while Wu and his friends insist that they are going home Tuesday, they have not indicated that they will not turn up on Monday at the First Committee. He still thinks that there is some small chance that they may change their plans, especially after they read our letter.

While we were in one room, the Secretary-General discussed matters with the Chinese (after the press conference) in an adjoining room. He found out that they had not received, or at least read our letter, so he proceeded to read it to them from a copy which we had given him, and it was then translated into Chinese. They were very interested, but indicated that they would make no change in their plans for departure. Lie then asked them if they would like to see the Cease Fire Committee, which was meeting in the next room. They said that they had high regard for the members of the Committee personally, but that this was a political matter which they were not able to discuss with the Committee officially, as they did not recognize the resolution setting it up. They said, however, that they would like to see Mr. Entezam, as President of the Assembly, not as a member of the Committee. Entezam, therefore, had a half an hour with them, which he said was devoted largely to an exchange of courtesies, ardent assertions of Asiatic solidarity, expressions of appreciation on the part of the Chinese of the motives behind Asian intervention in the Assembly, and of fear that the Americans, however, would make peace in the Pacific impossible. Entezam claims that he gave them some good advice, but that he did not talk to them at all about the Cease Fire resolution. We will leave that to Rau who is having dinner with them tonight.

Meanwhile, we decided not to issue any press communiqué, but to tell our press officer to emphasize to the journalists that our work had not finished and that, if necessary, we would get in touch with the Peking and North Korean Governments direct. The chances of this happening are, however, very slight. It is difficult to see what can be done, but we will be a little clearer on this point tomorrow when Rau reports about his dinner with the Chinese.

In addition to sending the letter to the Chinese Communists here, we had the Secretary-General cable it to the Peking Government direct. The cable is attached as Annex V.† Wu, according to Trygve Lie, did not seem to worry about us going over his head in this manner.

We also agreed to make an interim report to the First Committee on Monday on the progress (?) of our negotiations for a "cease fire". We would emphasize that this was merely an interim, and not a final report. I suspect that some of the U.S. people would like to make it a final report.

December 17, 1950 (Sunday)

Rau phoned me this morning to see if I could meet Entezam and him this afternoon, as he would like to report on his evening with the Chinese. Accordingly, we met at Entezam's flat at 3.30, when Rau reported to us on his evening with Wu & Co.

Our Indian colleague, who is becoming more and more spiritual and ghost-like as our work proceeds (it has been a very great strain on his far-from-robust physique), spent about four hours with his Chinese friends and found them, as usual, friendly and full of talk about peace and Asian co-operation. At the same time, whenever he confronted them with the concrete questions and problems arising out of the present situation in Korea, and in the United Nations, they did not budge an inch from the stubborn position that they had previously taken; namely, that all that was required was for the American aggressors to get out of Korea and Formosa and stay out. They insisted that the "cease fire" resolution was merely a trap, and one which they would not walk into. They also indicated that no fire crackers had been set off in Peking at the possibility of our arrival there to negotiate! In fact, they thought we would be wasting our time in going to Peking, which, I suppose, we would. Rau was very discouraged about it all and I think that he is losing most of his illusions about negotiating with Communists. However, he was cheered up by the farewell remarks of the Chinese. They urged him not to give up hope, but keep on working with the other members of the Committee for a "cease fire" and peace. Rau seemed to think that this meant that the door was not closed, but, of course, it may only mean that we are to keep on working to get the Americans to alter their "aggressive" policy.

The three of us then discussed the procedure we should follow at the First Committee tomorrow. After making our interim report (I think Rau should do this) we can try to get the Committee to adjourn until we make our final report. Alternatively, we can (1) continue discussion of the Russian item of American aggression in China and Formosa, which would bring a long speech by Dulles or Austin, (2) discuss the 6-Power Resolution on Korea, or (3) the second Asian resolution, which provides for negotiation, through a committee, of outstanding differences in the Far East. Rau, of course, favoured this latter course, as he thought that it would help to remove the feeling which is strong in Communist minds that the first resolution was merely a trap to get a "cease fire" without any commitment to subsequent negotiation. There may be something in this, and we rather hope that the Committee would adopt this procedure, but the Americans may be bitterly opposed to it. I, therefore, suggested that we meet again at 8.30 and get Gross and Jebb to attend. I said that I would arrange the meeting. Later I telephoned Gross and Jebb and they will be on hand.

I also had a talk this afternoon with the Secretary-General who thinks that we should now call off "cease fire" negotiations altogether, admit failure, pass the 6-Power Resolution, and then refer the whole question of what action, if any, should be taken against the Chinese, if they continue aggression in Korea, to the Collective Measures Committee set up in the United Action For Peace resolution. I do not know whether Lie is influenced more by his desire to spend Christmas in Norway, or to strike another blow for collective security in the United Nations. He kept warning me that we must now be very careful in the "Cease Fire" Committee not to give the impression that we are "appeasing" the Chinese. I had thought of suggesting that he should come to our meeting tonight, but after talking to him, decided that he would not be much help.

December 18, 1950 (Monday)

We met last night from 8.30 until nearly midnight at the Ritz Towers. In addition to the President, Sir Benegal and myself, there were present also Gladwyn Jebb, Ernie Gross and a colleague from his delegation, and Dayal of the Indian Delegation.

We at once tried to urge on Gross the advantages of discussing and voting on the second Asian Resolution to remove Chinese fears that we were not serious about negotiating Far Eastern issues once the "cease fire" had taken place. We pointed out that this did not involve any additional commitment, because, in fact, we were committed to this course of action by the Preamble of the Asian Resolution we had already passed. We also argued that Mr. Attlee and Mr. Truman, in their communiqué from Washington, had committed themselves to the principle of negotiating with the Chinese Communists. Why, then, not proceed at once with the second Asian Resolution, which would improve the atmosphere and, therefore, help the work of the Cease Fire Group.

Jebb would have gone even further and amended the Resolution to indicate that in the negotiating committee referred to, there would be included the U.S., U.K., U.S.S.R. and the Peking Governments. Gross could not take this at all, as it would appear to exclude the Chinese Nationalists. He did, however, toy with the idea of agreeing that the Resolution should be amended to refer to the "governments and authorities especially interested" as members of the negotiating committee. Gross thought that we were paying too much attention to Chinese Communist suspicions, and that in our preoccupation with their worries about a trap, we were losing sight of the fact that we might be making a trap for ourselves. He said that his government did not intend to back down from the Truman-Attlee communiqué, or to exclude the Chinese Communists from Korean negotiations, but that was a very different thing from specifically including them in a U.N. resolution at this stage. It is, of course, easy to understand the American position on this point, even though we may not approve of it. A resolution of this kind, which would specifically include the Chinese Communists in a negotiating committee, would, in fact, be a formal recognition of them, and almost an equally formal exclusion of the Chinese Nationalists. Gross was quite certain that Washington could not accept this.

I then tried to argue that we should leave the membership of the negotiating committee entirely open; and discuss and pass on the rest of the resolution. The President of the Assembly did not like this much, as he felt that once the resolution was passed, the names of the states would have to be filled in and we would be almost immediately up against the question of Chinese representation — the main point at issue. We had much talk but made little progress, and at the end of the evening I suggested that possibly we might reach agreement on the following course. When the committee met, the Cease Fire Group would make its interim report, and in that report emphasize that "cease fire" and negotiation were tied together, and as soon as one was arranged, the other would begin; also, that in the negotiation, the Chinese Communists would naturally be included in some appropriate form, making reference to the Truman-Attlee communiqué, to show that this was in the minds of those two governments. The U.S. and U.K. would then support this statement, thereby, it was hoped, removing Chinese Communist fears and suspicions. This suggested procedure was generally approved.

However, when I reached Lake Success this morning, I found that there was great confusion as to how we should act. Sir Benegal had overnight changed his mind on two things. First, he did not want to make the report on behalf of the Cease Fire Group, as I gathered he had received messages from New Delhi warning him against taking too active a part in our work. In fact, he indicated to me that his Prime Minister had said that if I were not on the Group, he would not be able to continue. Apparently they have some confidence that I will not allow Sir Benegal to get into too much trouble! He also did not think now that we should make a long statement as an interim report, in an effort to argue away Chinese fears. He felt that this might merely produce a debate which would not improve the atmosphere. He felt, therefore, that I should make a short interim statement, merely reading the cable we had sent to Peking, and explaining factually what we had done. After discussing the matter with Gross and finding that, in any event, the U.S. would not be able to support the longer statement along the lines indicated last night, I agreed to do this.

We then had several huddles before the meeting as to what we should do after we had made our interim report. The Americans did not seem very clear as to what they wanted, but agreed that they would not oppose a motion for adjourning until the Cease Fire Group was in a position to report again. When the committee met, therefore, I made my report, which got a friendly reception, even from Malik, and then after a considerable wrangle we adjourned.

After the meeting of the Committee, Rau, Entezam and I had a discussion. Rau now thinks that we should draft a statement for the press along the lines of the one we discussed last night, as a final effort to prove to the Chinese Communists that we were serious about negotiation after a "cease fire" took place. He said that the Asian group were very anxious that some such statement should be made, and they thought that it should come from our Committee. I agreed to try my hand at this and sent a draft over to them this evening. (Annex VI).†

Meanwhile, after a talk with the Secretary-General we decided that Rau should try to see the Chinese once again before they left, and report to us tomorrow. If there is no response from them or from Peking by Wednesday, we will then suggest to the Chairman of the Political Committee that he tell his members that there will be no meeting until January 3rd. By that time we will have our formal report ready, explaining our failure. We also will have a couple of weeks without any United Nations meetings on Korea and this may be helpful. As long as the Cease Fire Group is formally in session it will, presumably, be a little more difficult for the Chinese to begin their offensive in Korea, or certainly to justify it. It will be more difficult for the U.S. to summon the Political Committee for further and more decisive action against the Chinese. We may have to do that later, but we now have time to think things over and discuss the implications of any further action.

December 19, 1950 (Tuesday)

Rau paid his farewell visit to the Chinese this morning and he told Entezam and me about it at noon. He got nowhere, though on leaving Wu told him that they might be back again after their visit to Peiping. This is probably an attempt to befuddle and deceive us, though you never can tell with these chaps. Rau said that he did his best to persuade them that they were making a big mistake in ignoring the cease-fire discussions.

We then talked about the issue of a communiqué along the lines of that worked out yesterday. Entezam and I had doubts of the wisdom of this in view of the uncompromising attitude of Peiping. So we agreed to abandon our press statement and, instead, send a further telegram to Peiping in an effort to remove the misunderstanding and fears that Wu had expressed to Rau. I agreed to alter the draft press communiqué accordingly. We also agreed to send a final message to Peiping Thursday, (if we had not heard from them) indicating that we would go ahead next week with our final report, not waiting any longer for their views. I said that I would draft that. (See Annexes VII and VIII)†.

In the afternoon I put these two documents together — and told the U.S. and U.K. what we were doing. The former won't like it.

We met at Entezam's at 5.30 and I read them the messages. Rau thought our telegram to Peiping should be more positive in its assurances that if a cease-fire could be arranged, the Chinese Communists could expect negotiations to begin at once and to be included as members of any U.N. Committee for that purpose. But I didn't think that we should go too far. After all, we couldn't bind the U.N., though we could commit ourselves, and also the Asian sponsors of the Resolution who, earlier in the afternoon, had been consulted by Rau.

Our telegram went off tonight, and I am going to Ottawa tomorrow. Wu & Co. left this afternoon issuing a final statement which did not help — though it might have been worse.

Their mission was certainly a failure and possibly worse, as it may have hardened them in their position, without giving them any understanding whatever of the United Nations or of the United States.

Addressed Washington No. 276.
Following for Wrong from Riddell, Begins: Before Mr. Pearson left for Ottawa this afternoon, he despatched a telegram to Canadian Ambassador in New Delhi, the text of which is contained in my immediately following teletype. As you probably know, members of the cease-fire group consider that a day or two should be allowed to elapse, and that if reply to cease-fire communication has not then been received from Peking, Chinese Communist Government should then be informed that group intends to proceed next week with preparation of its report and that it hopes reply may be available by that time. Expectation then is that cease-fire group could report to First Committee about January 3rd. This tentative timetable has not been made known to other delegations, and it may be, of course, that there will be an insistent demand from some quarters for a meeting of the Political Committee before January 3rd.

2. The Minister also asked me to tell you that during an informal conversation on December 19th, Sir Benegal Rau told him that, according to Pannikar, Chinese Communists, if they were permitted to participate in negotiations for settlement of Far Eastern problems, would not, repeat not, insist on either immediate withdrawal of United Nations forces from Korea, nor on immediate withdrawal of United States seventh fleet from Formosa. According to Rau's report, Chinese would accept arrangements by which United Nations forces would eventually be withdrawn from Korea and seventh fleet would be either simultaneously or subsequently withdrawn from Formosa. He said that arrangement of this nature concerning Formosa would be within the meaning of President Truman's statement that seventh fleet would be withdrawn following Korean settlement. He was not sure now, however, that United States authorities would still be willing to withdraw seventh fleet as part of a general settlement. In response to a direct enquiry from Rau, the Minister said that he thought that, as part of the price for a settlement in Korea which would permit them to withdraw upon some basis that would provide possibility for establishment of United Nations objectives in Korea, the United States Government would be prepared to consider withdrawal of the seventh fleet from Formosa. Rau asked if he might report this view to his Government, and the Minister agreed, although he pointed out he had merely expressed a personal estimate of the situation.

3. Either because he believes that position has now hardened to the point where any compromise on Formosa is impossible, or because of some lingering resentment over treatment which was given Pannikar's earlier reports forecasting Chinese intervention, Rau has not made information contained in more recent Pannikar report generally available to other delegations. Mr. Pearson does not feel free at this stage to discuss Pannikar's report with United States delegation, but thought there might be some point in pressing Rau for a more explicit and detailed account of what Pannikar had said. Before doing so, however, he wondered if you had heard any echo of the report, or if you had any comment to make on it. Ends.

1. As you know, I have been engaged with Entezam and Rau as members of Cease-Fire Committee appointed under resolution of the General Assembly in an effort to establish satisfactory cease-fire arrangements in Korea. I have greatly enjoyed working with both my colleagues in this Committee, and I hope that you will tell Bajpai of my appreciation of Rau's helpful and farseeing approach to the task upon which we are engaged together. None of the group is overly optimistic of the result, but all of us feel that every reasonable and honourable effort to reach an accommodation must be tried and exhausted.

2. I have been hoping that, through Pannikar, the Indian Government has taken the occasion to interpret to the Chinese authorities the function of the cease-fire group and the approach which it is making to the problem. Rau has not indicated to us either that Pannikar had approached the authorities in Peking concerning the functions of the cease-fire group or that Indian Government has received any comment from him about the attitude of the authorities in Peking. I should be interested to learn of any information which Bajpai may be prepared to give you concerning Pannikar's contacts with Chinese authorities since the establishment of the cease-fire group. Following for Mr. Riddell and Mr. Pearson, Begins: Your messages Nos. 276 and 277 of December 20th.

1. I have heard nothing of a report about the possibilities of negotiations with the Chinese Communists on lines such as Rau mentioned to Mr. Pearson, and I think that further information should be sought from Bajpai or Rau himself.

2. I am seeing Hickerson later today and I shall sound him out on this without revealing what Rau told Mr. Pearson, and I shall also seek from him his views on the probable timetable for the Cease-Fire Committee.

3. I share Rau's doubt that the United States authorities would agree to withdraw the seventh fleet as part of a general settlement without some understanding that if the Chinese Communists proceeded to defeat the Nationalist forces in Formosa, the island would not become a base for future hostile operations. Such an understanding, even if it were not given in good faith and were promptly violated by stationing substantial Communist air and ground formations in Formosa, would assist in securing public acceptance in this country. Before the United States would go as far as this, I think it would be essential for Peking to agree to a Korean settlement which accorded with the principles of the United Nations action in Korea. 1. I saw Bajpai this evening and expressed your appreciation.

2. I asked if he could give me any information concerning Panikkar's [discussions] with Chinese since establishment of cease-fire group. He answered Panikkar had only been hearing about China not listening to cease-fire proposals separated from Formosa, etc. He said nothing about Panikkar having been asked to interpret the functions of cease-fire group.

3. Bajpai had noted recent statement by Wu seeming to suggest Chinese might be somewhat more forthcoming. He had never been optimistic about the nations' efforts and he felt doubtful about prospects of cease-fire group. Today, however, he had drafted for Nehru a telegram to Panikkar asking whether the Chinese were persisting or would agree to discuss a cease-fire first, cease-fire to be followed progressively by discussions on Korea and possibly Formosa, etc... . I see him again tomorrow and may learn final terms of instructions.

4. Bajpai said, while India would be "willing to help" she would tell China she "must not open her mouth too widely". If Chinese continue adamant Bajpai added, it might be necessary to try to persuade the United States to modify its position. In his opinion issues should be taken up at Prime Ministers' meeting in an effort to achieve a united Commonwealth front for a possible approach to the United States.[83] Ends.

CEASE FIRE GROUP

Rau and I met Entezam at his office this morning to discuss telegram to Peking upon which you had already agreed, indicating timetable for further work of the group. When we met, Entezam said that he had learned through Grafstrom that Chinese had in effect refused to discuss Korean conflict with the cease fire group. It turned out, however, that communication sent through Swedish channels was a reply to a message from Entezam suggesting that Wu and his delegation be permitted to discuss cease fire arrangements in New York. Although message from Chinese through Swedish channels almost certainly indicates line which will be taken in direct reply to message from cease fire group, if any is given, it could not be regarded as a reply to your first communication from group sent on December 16th. Text of message sent through Swedish channels is contained in my immediately following teletype. You will notice that Chinese Government bases its refusal to cooperate in the work of the cease fire group partly on the claim that its representatives were given no opportunity to participate in discussions at which cease fire resolution was carried. In this connection, Rau pointed out that many members of the committee had been prepared to have Chinese Communist delegation participate in these discussions, and that he had privately asked Wu if he would be willing to attend the committee when the item was being considered. Wu had replied that he did not wish to attend. Rau mentioned these circumstances to Grafstrom and suggested that Swedish Minister to Peking be informed.

2. In view of the possibility that reports on the third telegram might reach the press in a distorted form, it was decided to release the text to the press, after appropriate interval to permit delivery in Peking. From enquiries I have received subsequently from newspaper correspondents, point seems to have got across that telegram contains a timetable rather than a deadline.

3. Delegations are being informed by the Secretariat that cease fire group has nothing further to report at the moment but that members of the Political Committee should hold themselves ready to meet on twenty-four hours' notice. Entezam and the Secretary-General thought it would be preferable to use this formula in case a meeting of the Committee was considered desirable before January 3rd. Expectation is, however, that meeting will not be held prior to that date.

4. Rau and Entezam have agreed to meet again on Wednesday morning, December 27th, at which time I said that I would try to have in their hands a first draft of a final report, based on the assumption that Chinese either did not reply, or replied negatively.

CEASE FIRE GROUP

With reference to my immediately preceding teletype, following is text of message transmitted through Swedish Government. Text begins:

The Central People's Government acknowledges receipt of a message dated 18th December 1950 from Mr. Entezam, President of the General Assembly transmitted via the Swedish Government and asks the Swedish Government to transmit the following reply to Mr. Entezam, President of the General Assembly.

1. The representative of the People's Republic of China neither participated in nor agreed to the adoption of the resolution concerning the so-called 3-men committee for cease fire in Korea by United Nations General Assembly. The Central People's Government has repeatedly declared that the Central People's Government would regard as illegal and null and void all resolutions especially those concerning Asia which might be adopted by the United Nations without the participation and approval of the duly approved delegation of the People's Republic of China. Therefore the Central People's Government cannot instruct its representative General Wu to continue to remain in Lake Success for negotiations with the above mentioned 3-men illegal committee. After the Security Council unreasonably voted against the "complaint against the United States armed aggression against Taiwan" raised by the People's Republic of China General Wu was instructed by the Central People's Government to continue to stay at Lake Success for participation in the discussion of "the complaint of the United States aggression against China" submitted by the USSR representative; although he has waited for a long time and meantime the United Nations General Assembly was declared adjourned, he was still not given the opportunity to speak. Under such circumstances, the Central People's Government deems that there is no more necessity for General Wu and his staff to remain at Lake Success and has therefore instructed him to start their homeward journey on December 19th.

2. As to the question of how the United Nations may get in touch with the Korean Democratic People's Republic the Central People's Government is of the opinion that United Nations should address direct inquiry to the Government of the Korean Democratic People's Republic. Text ends.

My message Candel No. 101 of December 21st.

1. I have asked Hickerson whether the Department of State had received from any source information indicating that the Chinese Communists might agree to negotiations in terms more acceptable than those put forward by Wu in New York. He answered that no such information had been received. The Indian Government has therefore not yet informed the United States through any channel of Pannikar's report mentioned in your message No. 276 of December 20th.

2. I asked him whether he thought that it would be reasonable for the Cease-Fire Committee to make no report to the Political Committee until about January 3rd even though they had good reason to give up hope before then that they could accomplish anything. He said at once that this would be completely acceptable to the United States. Indeed he seemed to think it important that the report should be delayed until about that time as an earlier report might lead to some criticism among the Asiatic sponsors of the Assembly resolution establishing the Committee and also in the western countries that the Committee had returned a negative report after too brief an effort to negotiate a cease-fire. If, of course, the approaches to Peking result in any indication of possible progress, a longer delay or a brief interim report at the beginning of January might be required.

3. I shall report separately on other questions about the Far Eastern situation which arose during our discussion.

CONFIDENTIAL

Following for Riddell from Mr. Pearson, Begins: Your telegram 739 of December 21, cease-fire group. A.P. despatch from Tokyo states that Chou-en-Lai has replied to our messages and rejects participation in our work as Red China did not participate in formation at United Nations of the cease-fire committee. If this is confirmed, we should make it clear, in a statement from the committee now or as part of our report, that Chinese Communist Delegation had been asked by Rau if they would be willing to attend the Committee when the item was being considered and had refused.

2. You will remember that when the first Asian resolution was up for consideration we were worried because the Chinese Delegation had not been formally invited to participate in our work and were told that there was no use sending such an invitation because the Chinese would reject it. Nevertheless, the reported attitude in Peiping confirms my view that such a formal invitation should have been sent so that they could not now say they had never been invited. It was unfortunate that the question was not raised in the Political Committee in spite of the United States objection to it. Ends.

CEASE-FIRE COMMITTEE

Following for Wrong from Pearson, Begins: I was glad to learn from your message yesterday that Hickerson and others in Washington appreciate the purposes and activities of our committee. We have not always found the same understanding at Lake Success. I am particularly glad to get their reassurances that the United States does, in fact, sincerely desire a cease-fire arrangement and does not wish the committee to hurry its report if such an arrangement cannot be achieved. It seems to me that the committee has already performed a useful function in exposing the Chinese position, in making it more difficult for the Chinese to justify any further offensive action in Korea, and, indeed, in the establishment of a mechanism by which the cease-fire discussions could be later re-opened if rejected, as they appear to have been, by the Chinese now. The form in which we have received up to the present the Chinese rejection indicates that there is some desire on their part not to close the door finally.

2. The main issue, of course, is concerned with the fear, probably genuine, of the Chinese communists that a cease-fire would not be followed by U.N. negotiations on political issues, or at least negotiations in which they would be asked to participate. If the Cease-Fire group could have given some specific assurances on this point, with which the United States had been associated, we might have been more successful. We have, however, been careful in our discussions as a group not to commit the United Nations to anything, and also not to give the impression that we are attempting to make an arrangement between two parties which had the same status. Rau, for instance, would have gone somewhat further than we did in our messages to meet the Chinese fears, but Entezam and I felt that we should be very careful not to give the impression of mediation or, indeed, of neutrality on our part. Also, we appreciate the undesirability and, indeed, the impossibility of accepting any price from the Chinese for a cease-fire which could not be justified by our previous action in Korea or by our obligations under the Charter. We felt, for instance, that while it would be wrong for us to tell the Chinese that if a cease-fire were achieved, United Nations forces would be withdrawn from Korea, or the Chinese complaint of aggression against Formosa considered in subsequent negotiations, it was perfectly in order to express our own view that a cease-fire should be followed by negotiations which might discuss other than strictly Korean matters, and in which the Chinese Communists would take part.

3. From discussions we have had here with Bliss, and which Riddell has had with Ross in New York, the United States attitude to our cease-fire work is now becoming somewhat more constructive and flexible, and they would be willing to associate themselves with the kind of assurance, concerning negotiations, to the Chinese that I have mentioned above. If they had been able to take this line over last weekend, it would have been very helpful to the cease-fire committee, but even now a public statement along the lines of the position taken by Bliss in his talk with me today would be useful. Alternatively, if in our report to the Assembly we can suggest in some detail a timetable of negotiations and the subjects for discussion if a cease-fire has been achieved, that would be useful. But I do not think that we as a group would be willing to do this unless we had some reasonable assurance that the United States would accept the position that we would be taking. I think that we should now discuss this matter with the Americans and have indicated this to Riddell who will, as a first step, be talking to Rau today about some such procedure as that outlined above. It may not, of course, be possible for the United States to take an initiative of this kind for a general Korean settlement, but it might be possible for the cease-fire group to put it forward at the next meeting of the Political Committee. Anyway, I think we should give consideration to this possibility. One cannot be sure, of course, that this reasonable United States attitude would be reciprocated in Peiping but there would be no harm, I think, in making proposals which might clarify the position in both places.

4. If the Political Committee does not meet until January, we will have a little time to think these questions out, providing, of course, there is not some further aggressive Chinese action in Korea in the meantime. I would be glad to have your views concerning them. I am sending a copy of this telegram to Riddell.

Yesterday evening Bliss of the United States Embassy showed us a telegram outlining the United States attitude towards the work of the Cease-Fire Committee. Bliss explained that this was a copy of a message sent by the State Department to the United States Delegation at Lake Success designed to serve as the basis for discussions between the Delegation and the Cease-Fire Committee.

2. The telegram defined the United States attitude in a series of four points:

(a) The original reason for United Nations action in Korea had been a decision to resist aggression by North Korean forces. To this had now been added aggression by the Chinese Communists. In working out a settlement, care should be taken to ensure that aggression was not rewarded.

(b) The constant objective of the United States, as of the United Nations, had been the establishment of an independent, unified and democratic Korea. On the other hand, the United Nations had never been committed to achieving that objective no matter what amount of force might be required. It was now clear that the aggressors could prevent the United Nations from completing the task.

(c) The United States had always believed that United Nations forces should be withdrawn from Korea as quickly as possible. The minimum conditions, however, for such a withdrawal by United Nations forces must be a cessation of North Korean attacks across the 38th Parallel and "withdrawal of the Chinese". (By this was presumably meant withdrawal of the Chinese Communists from the whole of Korea although this point was not spelled out in the telegram.) The United States was very anxious that the work of the Three-Member Committee should result in a cease-fire. In that event, it might be possible to reach a peaceful settlement which would be acceptable not only to the people of Korea but also to her neighbours. Once a cease-fire had been secured, therefore, the United States would be willing to discuss a peaceful settlement with other interested parties, including the Chinese Communists. In the opinion of the United States, neither side should publicly insist on any conditions before these discussions were initiated.

(d) Willingness to discuss a peaceful settlement was in accordance with the obligations which the United States had assumed under the United Nations Charter and should, therefore, not be construed as appeasement.

3. The telegram concluded by declaring that the United States attached great importance to securing a cease-fire before there was an attack in force across the 38th Parallel.

4. This would seem to mark an important and welcome change in United States policy.

My telegram No. 645 of December 22: United States attitude towards the work of the Cease-Fire Committee.

Bliss called again this morning with a further message from Washington which showed that the United States Government had gone even further in the direction of flexibility than I indicated in my preceding telegram. This second telegram was a copy of a message which had been sent by the State Department to the United States Ambassador in New Delhi. As in the case of the previous message, I was not given a copy. However, I was allowed to take notes. The second message read substantially as follows:

"In the event that a cease-fire can be established and that procedures can be worked out leading to subsequent discussions, it is the view of the United States Government that the discussions must be confined initially to Korea. On the other hand, we would not rule out the inclusion in the agenda of other items including Formosa, provided that consideration of these additional subjects was not linked with consideration of a peaceful settlement in Korea. In entering into such discussions, we could not agree to make any prior commitments beforehand."

2. I told Bliss that I was very glad to hear of this decision. Obviously it was of great importance that the new United States attitude should be communicated clearly, forcibly and quickly to Peking. There seemed to me to be a number of ways in which this could be done.

(a) The United States Ambassador in New Delhi might ask the Indian authorities to have Pannikar communicate it to Chou-en-Lai. It might perhaps be inferred from the fact that the original of the message from the State Department had been sent to New Delhi that the United States authorities had this in mind. I added that it might be useful for me to send a personal message to New Delhi, perhaps to Bajpai, stating that I had seen the State Department messages outlining the new United States position, that I had full faith in them and that I hoped he would have them brought to the attention of the authorities in Peking.

(b) Another possible method of accomplishing the same result might be to have the Political Committee take up quickly the second Asian resolution calling for negotiations with the Chinese Communists. If this resolution were amended to make it clear that negotiations could be begun only after a cease-fire had been effected and if such an amended resolution were passed (as it would be) with a large majority including the United States, the Chinese Communists would be faced with unmistakable evidence that the United States was willing to enter into discussions.

(c) A further possibility might be for the Cease-Fire Committee itself to address a communication to Peking embodying the new United States views. If it were to prove difficult for Rau to associate himself with such a communication, perhaps one of the other two members of the Committee might issue a public statement along the same lines. The United States could then strengthen the effect of such a declaration by expressing publicly its readiness to participate in discussions with the Chinese Communists in the event of a cease-fire.

3. I should be grateful if you would get in touch with Rau and inform him of the United States views if they have not yet been given to him. I should also like you to tell him that I hope he will request his Government to have these views transmitted through Pannikar to the People's Government in Peking. You might also take the opportunity of discussing with him the other alternative ways I have outlined above of trying to convince the Chinese Communists of the willingness of the United States to enter into discussions with them if a cease-fire can be established.

Following for Chipman from the Minister, Begins: My telegrams Nos. 185 and 186 of yesterday's date: U.S. attitude to the work of the Cease-Fire Committee.

You will have seen from my two immediately preceding telegrams that the United States attitude towards the work of the Cease-Fire Committee has now substantially altered and that they are now readier than even a few days ago to enter into discussions with the Chinese Communists if a cease-fire can be established. I should be grateful if you would at once bring this information to Bajpai's attention and say that I hope he may be in a position to ask Pannikar to convey it to the authorities in Peking.

2. In speaking to Bajpai you should make it clear that I have seen the messages in which the United States policy is embodied and feel that they represent a genuine effort on the part of Washington to bring about a peaceful solution, by negotiation, of Korean and related questions. I should also like you to tell Bajpai that, in my opinion, the United States willingness to participate in such discussions with the Chinese Communists marks a very important development and shows very considerable courage on the part of the Administration in Washington, in view of the present temper of public opinion in the United States. If these decisions had been taken earlier they would have greatly facilitated the work of the Cease-Fire Committee. But even now they are extremely valuable, I think, and offer some hope of a settlement, or at least of a prolonged detente. It would be tragic if they were rudely rebuffed in Peiping — something, however, which we cannot, to say the least, rule out. I myself am convinced of the genuineness of the new United States attitude and I am anxious that every possible means should be used of convincing the regime in Peking. It is for this reason that I am asking you to approach Bajpai as a matter of urgency. Ends.

1. I have just seen Rusk and shown him your message. The most important thing he said, in greatest secrecy, was that instructions have gone to Peking for a direct approach to the Chinese Communists on the lines of the messages shown you by Bliss. He read me extracts to prove his point. He was not at liberty to tell me the channel employed which was identified only as "X".

2. He said that the Chinese would not give credence to public assurance about the readiness of the United States to negotiate, at any rate without private backing of this sort. He also said that they could not agree to the alternative course mentioned in your paragraph 3 that the Cease-Fire Committee might in reporting to the Assembly list the subjects for discussion in negotiations after a cease fire. They are ready to talk about Formosa and other points of concern to Peking, but they would wish to bring up Indo-China, perhaps Tibet, and other causes for grave complaint. The agenda would have to be left open or expressed in general terms. It would also be impracticable to specify in advance the parties to the negotiations, who might vary in accordance with the subject matter.

3. He did not explicitly rule out a public statement of United States readiness to negotiate following a cease fire. I should think they would want to receive a report of the private approach to Peking, which may be made today, before further considering this.

4. He remarked that their readiness to negotiate on questions other than the Korean settlement was a concession, as the negotiations would take place under some duress because of the presence of large Chinese forces in Korea. It was considered, however, very important in the global situation to get more time. In six months or so the United States should have another million men in their forces. The present might well be the most dangerous period.

5. He said that if an attack in force were launched below the 38th Parallel by the Chinese the prospect of any cease-fire or abatement of danger in the Far East would be imperilled. The military were not afraid of the Chinese and were prepared for a new battle, but the diplomatic and legal situation would become far more difficult.

6. He also told me that in inter-delegation talks in New York it had been suggested that the CFM, if it meets soon, might discuss Korea and other asiatic questions — possibly with representation of the Chinese Communists.

7. He asked me to send you his hearty seasonal greetings. Ends.

Following for the Minister from Chipman, Begins: As your telegram No. 187 seemed to modify somewhat instructions in your telegram No. 186, I confined myself this morning in interviewing Bajpai to No. 187 and discussing the three alternatives of paragraph 2 of your telegram No. 186.

2. He, however, read me note of an interview with Henderson on December 18th, on Bajpai's request for elucidation of American position, which used same language as you quote in telegram No. 186, paragraph 1. This Bajpai considered insufficient and ambiguous, particularly as regards conditions as to additional subjects not being linked with peaceful settlement.

3. He said that Chinese are hardening and that when Indian Counsellor recently visited Foreign Office to discuss Korea, Chinese were not interested in hearing of United States position.

4. He read me a letter from Nehru to Attlee in which Nehru even suggested his readiness to go either to Washington or to Peking, but he is convinced of uselessness of latter unless American attitude changed and he could bring something definite. A copy of this was sent to Panikkar for private information only, accompanied by instructions to say to Peking:

(a) Are they prepared to negotiate on previous suggestion of cease-fire, demilitarized zone, Korea, and Formosa on basis of Cairo and Potsdam Declarations;

(b) Conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers was not a "ganging-up" on China. India will use occasion to work for peace and enlist support of all Commonwealth countries for this;

(c) Any increase by China of her demands will rule out possibility of settlement and make war inevitable;

(d) India earnestly hopes that China will not take any steps so dangerous.

5. Bajpai is against taking up second Asian resolution. China would consider its reference to "all issues" a trap. It might also, he thought, result in a cross of wires. He is also against direct communication to Peking by Cease-Fire Committee. As China considers Committee illegal, this would only invite rebuff. He further thinks that a mere statement to Peking of present American thinking would be valueless and should be avoided.

6. He suggests Committee should temporarily hold its hand and await answer to Panikkar's communication. This might come in one or two days. Next step, depending on Peking's answer, might be a direct and precise assurance obtained from United States, which India could pass on to Peking, in most definite and unconditional terms possible.

7. He would hope that your relations with Washington might help to get such assurances and that you and Attlee will keep in close touch.

KOREAN CEASE-FIRE

You will see from the messages received from Chipman that the Indian Government is attempting, through Panikkar, to secure further information about Chinese policy and intentions. I am inclined to agree that the Cease-Fire Group can accomplish nothing now by direct communication with Peking and should await the result of Panikkar's approaches. Bajpai's view is that the Chinese are not likely to be impressed by United States assurances of post cease-fire discussions as they are couched in language too vague. I doubt if they appreciate in New Delhi the importance of the new American position, or the difficulties in going beyond it in the face of Chinese fighting in Korea and Chinese intransigence at Lake Success and Peking. Nevertheless, if the United States could be somewhat more specific in describing the subjects which, among others, could be included in post cease-fire discussions, it would be more difficult for the Chinese to refuse this offer, assuming, of course, that Formosa and recognition were to be mentioned. Rusk has told you that they cannot do this and I appreciate the difficulties, but some of these might be overcome if Tibet and Indo-China were also mentioned.

2. If the Americans cannot do this, the Chinese may reject both cease-fire and discussions, on the grounds that the U.S. assurances were too vague to be worth anything. This position, while unjustified, may not appear so to many other countries. Of course, the Chinese may reject any proposition made to them and may be entirely insincere in any reference to subsequent negotiations; they may well have made an arrangement with the Russians by which fighting is to go on in Korea until the United Nations are driven out and any exchanges now are merely to confuse and divide us. But if we appreciate this and remain on guard against it, I don't think myself that the United States would have anything to lose by going a little further in their assurances regarding post cease-fire talks. At best, it might make such talks possible. At worst, it might smoke out and expose the hypocrisy of the Chinese position.

3. There is no doubt that we cannot get the Chinese to isolate Korea from other Far Eastern issues, especially Formosa. Personally, I doubt whether we should expect them to. If that is true, shouldn't we go further even than we have gone in linking up general Far Eastern discussions with a cease-fire. As long as we continue to insist, as we must do, that nothing can be done until a cease-fire arrangement has actually been made effective, I don't think that this course of action can justifiably be attacked as yielding to blackmail or "appeasement". But we will certainly have to act quickly if we act at all.

Your EX-2708 of December 26th. Korean cease fire.

1. I saw Rusk late today. He saw a number of difficulties in the suggestion that the United States should be more specific in indicating the subjects which might be taken up in discussions with the Chinese, but said that he would wrestle with the problem. One difficulty would be listing specific subjects without mentioning who would be parties to the discussions in each case. Another would be the possible implication that this meant a readiness to make concessions to the Chinese, in advance of the discussions, on matters such as Formosa and admission to the United Nations. It is easier for them to say sincerely that they are ready to discuss all the issues than to list specific issues. Furthermore, he doubts that the Chinese, as suggested in the first sentence of your paragraph 2, would reject the cease-fire and the discussion for the reason that their assurances are too vague, although they might cite this as an explanation.

2. He told me that the Indian Government knew nothing of the approach to Peking described in my WA-3360 of December 23rd. They were not the channel employed on this occasion.

3. Just before I saw him the ticker reported the "last warning" given on the Peking radio in the usual unyielding terms, and he thinks this probably is a prelude to a large attack south of the 38th Parallel. He also said that some mixed North Korean and Chinese formations have been encountered below the parallel.

KOREA CEASE-FIRE

Following for Chipman from Pearson, Begins: Thank you for your very interesting message No. 300 of December 24. I am grateful to Bajpai for his information as a result of which I am sending a message to Washington which has been repeated to you. I hope direct Indian intervention has more effect than that of our cease-fire group, which cannot continue its own approaches to Peking in the face of the crude and negative Chinese attitude.

2. I hope that they appreciate at New Delhi, and will emphasize at Peking, that the United States has already made important concessions but that concessions on these matters cannot all be made by the United Nations or the United States, and that so far Peking has done nothing to bridge the gap which exists between the two positions. I hope also they realize that a renewal of Chinese military action in Korea, which may have taken place even before you receive this, will automatically end, at least for the time being, all United Nations efforts to bring about a cease-fire and a negotiated settlement. It will also inevitably result in formal charges of Chinese Communist aggression which the majority of United Nations members will be forced on the evidence to support, and in full awareness of all the tragic consequences which will inevitably follow. To prevent such a development, I hope that the Americans may go somewhat further in assurances to Peking than they have gone. That is why I sent this morning's message to Washington. It is equally if not more important that the Chinese should do something except insult the United Nations and attack United Nations forces.

3. I hope therefore that as a result of India's wise and timely intervention the Peking authorities will understand this and give us some hope that a peaceful solution of these problems can be achieved.

KOREA

You will recall that on December 10 the United States Ambassador showed me a circular communication from the State Department which had gone to the United States missions in countries which are members of the United Nations and which are not members of the Soviet bloc. In the circular communication the United States set forth for the information of the governments of these countries its views on the action which the United Nations might take in respect of the Chinese intervention in Korea. The State Department said that, if the Chinese Communists pressed their attack below the 38th Parallel in an effort to drive the U.N. forces into the sea, the United States would seek U.N. approval of a resolution to brand the Chinese Communist Government as aggressors. The State Department added that they were still considering what other U.N. action would be called for in such a resolution, and that they "would welcome the views of other U.N. members". (The text of the circular communication was left at the Department on December 12 and was transmitted to you as No. EX-2559 of December 13.)[84]

2. Since the circular communication of December 10 was prepared, the views of the United States have altered materially. Because of this and because of the continued rapid march of events, we have decided that it would be neither wise nor useful to give the United States a formal reply to their communication. In any event the State Department is by now well aware of our views on the more immediate aspects of the Korean question as a result of my talks with their representatives in New York and your talks in Washington.

3. In order to clarify our own thinking on some of the basic questions underlying any decisions which may have to be made in respect of Korea, we have prepared a memorandum entitled "Korea: action in the United Nations." This memorandum has been approved by the Prime Minister. The text is given in my immediately following teletype.

4. It occurs to us that the United States authorities might welcome this summary of our current thinking. You might, therefore, inform the State Department of the contents of the memorandum and, if you think this would be useful, you may leave a copy of the memorandum with them.

[84] Voir le document 187./See Document 187.

5. You might say that the memorandum is an effort to set forth some general conclusions which would carry the judgement of countries such as India and Pakistan as well as of our Western allies. As such, it might be of some help in assisting in the process of consultation which is now going on.

6. Of more immediate importance is what action the United States are contemplating in the Political Committee next week. Are they contemplating proposals such as are rumoured in the press — economic warfare of some kind against China? extension of trade embargo? blockade? Any information which you can obtain for me on this point would be very helpful.

213. DEA/50069-A-40

Note

Memorandum

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], December 27, 1950

KOREA: ACTION IN THE UNITED NATIONS

1. Events have moved fast since the beginning of this month. The military situation in Korea appears to be becoming somewhat stabilized and it would seem as if there is now a good chance that a position in Southern Korea can be held more or less indefinitely. The General Assembly has suspended action on the six-power resolution and has appointed a committee to discuss the possibility of a cease-fire in Korea. It had been generally agreed that this committee must be given ample time to try to accomplish its purpose.

2. Decisions as to future action in the United Nations must be taken in the light of global strategy and of the present balance of armed forces between the Soviet world and the democratic world. Given determination by the democratic world, time is on our side and we should, therefore, play for time so long as we can do so without appearing to deny our obligations under the United Nations Charter. If, despite all our efforts, the Soviet Union and China should precipitate a war, it is essential that the democratic nations should be united in their resistance to aggression and this end would be more difficult to achieve unless there had been sustained common efforts to avert a catastrophe. The door should therefore be left open until the last possible moment for a settlement with the Chinese Communists by negotiation, and every opportunity for discussion of the issues with Communist China should be explored.

3. The principles of the United Nations Charter must be maintained, but any action taken by the United Nations to cope with the aggression in the Far East should be decided primarily in the light of the main threat to these principles in other parts of the world, particularly in Europe.

4. The events of the past few months have demonstrated that the leaders of the Soviet Union are prepared to embark on policies which involve a grave risk of precipitating a general war. They may well have been encouraged to take these risks by their estimate of the present relative weakness of the forces which might be arrayed against them.

5. In these circumstances, the acceleration of defensive rearmament programmes will shorten the period of acute danger but will make the danger during that period even more acute. With China on the march and all of Asia striking out on new paths, the strengthening of the free world which is now taking place may provoke the leaders of the Soviet Union to strike within the next few months, before our defences reach the point where the Soviet leaders can no longer believe in the possibility of an easy victory in Europe and Asia.

6. It would therefore appear that the paramount consideration which the free nations of the world must take into account in determining their policy during the next twelve months' period of increasing strength is the necessity of doing nothing which might increase the danger of the Soviet Union precipitating a general war during this period. This means that our diplomacy must be wise and unprovocative, and that, in playing for time in which to get stronger, we must continue to be as conciliatory as possible. We shall have to make up our minds which positions are, in terms of our global strategy, essential and on which we stand firm, and where, on the other hand, we may have to accept rebuffs and local reverses.

7. Applying these general considerations to the situation in Korea, it would seem to be unwise to decide in advance at what point it might become necessary for the United Nations to name Communist China as an aggressor. In order to leave the door open for negotiations, the United Nations has so far deliberately and wisely refrained from naming Communist China an aggressor. The United Nations should continue this careful course as long as possible.

8. At some point, it may become impossible for the United Nations not to name Communist China an aggressor. However, before the United Nations is asked to make such a decision, the nations principally concerned should first agree on the proposals for action which they would wish to put before the United Nations after a resolution branding Communist China as an aggressor had been adopted.

9. Even now a war with the Soviet Union is not inevitable. The risks of war during the next year or so, however, will be great. After that period, the strength of the free world, although still less than that of the Soviet Union, should be sufficient to deter the leaders of the Soviet Union from precipitating war. The uneasy equilibrium thus established may then make possible the working out of a modus vivendi with the Soviet Union.

CEASE-FIRE GROUP

1. Group met this morning in President's office to consider draft report.† Rau and Entezam both had had an opportunity to consider draft text which I sent you yesterday. I told them that you had seen the draft and had made one or two textual comments, but that you had not had time to examine it in detail.

2. Rau said that he had now been advised by New Delhi of the exchange of telegrams which had taken place and that he understood that, on the one hand, Panikkar was being instructed to approach the Peking authorities and to request them to agree to a cease-fire prior to negotiations, while, on the other hand, we were approaching the State Department in an effort to persuade them to be more explicit about the agenda of the proposed discussions. He said that he had been advised by New Delhi that, pending a report from Panikkar, there was little further for the cease-fire group to do.

3. In regard to the draft report, Rau said that he would have to insist on a purely factual report which contained no comment whatever. The President then suggested that the draft which had been prepared might provide the basis for a report of this nature and suggested to Rau that he indicate the changes which he would wish to have made. Rau, however, refused even to consider the draft which was before him, saying that, after all, he did not wish this report to be the occasion for the outbreak of war.

4. I said that it had been my intention in drafting the report not to make comment, but simply to offer explanations and that I thought that in some cases explanations would be necessary. Rau said, however, that he thought the report should merely record the steps taken and the messages sent, and that it should conclude by pointing out the positions taken on the two sides. He said that he himself would proceed to prepare a new draft.

5. The President said that he, in any case, would like to submit his comments on the existing draft. He suggested that the name, Sir Benegal Rau, should be omitted from the second line of the third paragraph. In the fourth paragraph he asked that a phrase should be included stating that he had informed the General Assembly of the composition of the Cease-Fire Group. He thought also that the Secretary-General or Cordier should be consulted before reference to the Secretary-General was included. If it were stated that the Secretary-General was closely associated with the Cease-Fire Group, some comment might arise over the fact that Lie had left New York. Entazam added that Grafstrom would have to be consulted concerning the reference in paragraph 6 to the approach made through the Swedish representative in Peking. In paragraph 8 he suggested that the words "deliberately or otherwise" should be omitted, and in paragraph 9 he thought it should be made even more explicit that the message from Chou En-Lai had been addressed to the President of the Assembly in his official capacity.

6. Rau, in spite of his initial refusal to comment on the draft, participated in this discussion, and the only point at which he mentioned language which he regarded as objectionable was the phrase "deliberately or otherwise", in paragraph 8. He was by this time taking a rather more flexible attitude, and ended by saying that he expected to incorporate a good deal of the existing draft in his new draft.

7. Rau said that he would be meeting his Asian colleagues on Thursday and wondered whether he should give them some report of Panikkar's approach to the Chinese. Both Entezam and I suggested that it would be preferable to restrict information regarding Panikkar's activities to as narrow a group as possible for the time being. Rau said that there had been considerable pressure on the part of his Asian colleagues for some diplomatic initiative to be taken. His Iraqui colleague, for example, had suggested that all Asian States with Missions in Washington should jointly approach the United States Government with a request that the latter clarify its position in regard to negotiation on Far Eastern questions. I gathered from Rau's remarks and his report of his conversations with his Asian colleagues that there is a disposition amongst the Asian group to hold the United States principally responsible for the rigidities of the present position.

8. In regard to timetable, Rau and Entezam agreed on January 3rd as the date on which a report should be made. Rau said that it was his intention to go to London on January 5th in order to discuss Far Eastern matters with his Prime Minister. He hoped that it would be possible for the Cease-Fire Group to report before this date. He agreed to have his alternative draft ready for consideration at a meeting at 11:00 o'clock, Friday morning.

Following for Pearson from Chipman, Begins: Reference your telegram No. 191 of December 26th.

1. I saw Bajpai this afternoon and conveyed to him in confidence that you had telegraphed to Washington, also your hopes of what would be impressed on the Chinese. Bajpai shares your feelings on this point.

2. Panikkar has not yet been able to see Chou En-Lai. He was yesterday given further instructions to say that India would continue to support Chinese entrance to the United Nations and that a number of countries were favourable, but that it would be unwise to insist on entrance prior to negotiations on Korea and Formosa; also that withdrawal of United Nations troops would be included in any discussion on Korea and Formosa. He later referred to a discussion in New York between, he thought, the Americans, yourself and Malik during which latter stated that withdrawal of all foreign troops would include Chinese. Bajpai also said India is telling China that it would be impossible to have negotiations proceeding during the fighting. This was not, repeat not, in the instructions he showed me today and must, I suppose, have been earlier.

3. Bajpai feels that the whole affair has been concerted by Russia and China.

4. I should correct my cable No. 300, paragraph 5, second sentence. Now tells me he was referring not, repeat not, to Chinese fear about "all issues" but about his fears that they might wish to include Indo-China.

5. I might add for the Prime Minister before he proceeds to London that Nehru, in his letter to Attlee, said: "I earnestly hope every effort will be made to avoid the impression that this conference is a preparation for war." In his unreported speech yesterday at a state banquet for Menzies, with other diplomats, including Russian, present, Nehru emphasized the value of the Commonwealth as a force for peace. Ends.

KOREAN CEASE-FIRE

1. This message supplements last night's report of my discussion with Rusk. I gathered from him that they are thinking here of warning the Chinese that they will bomb the power installations on the Yalu River if substantial Chinese forces invade South Korea. He asked me if I thought that there was any bargaining value in this matter, adding that it was a fairly simple job for the air force to destroy the installations and the reservoirs, which are all on the Korean side of the boundary, without making use of Manchurian airspace. I said that there was a remote possibility that a promise of continued immunity for the installations would have a deterrent effect, adding that if such an offer were made and the Chinese nevertheless attacked heavily in South Korea, it would presumably be necessary then to destroy the installations. He did not reveal clearly what they had in mind. I think the matter is under debate and he wanted to get an outside opinion. Please give this report a minimum circulation.

2. In your EX-2708 you suggested that "Formosa and recognition" might be mentioned as subjects of discussion. I think it is too much to suggest that the United States should indicate a willingness to discuss recognition, which is primarily a matter for settlement by individual Governments. If the United States does recognize the Communists, it would presumably come at the end of a process beginning with withdrawal of recognition from the Nationalists, the transfer of the Chinese seat in the United Nations from the Nationalists to the Communists (a matter for United Nations decision), and finally United States recognition of the Communists. Should we not be more precise if we have occasion to approach the State Department again on this?

3. I told Rusk about the present intention of the Cease-Fire Committee to report on or about January 2nd. He raised no objection, but asked if it would be possible in the event of a massive Chinese attack to speed up the report. I answered that I understood a draft was in preparation and that the Committee should be in a position to report late this week if this seemed desirable.

4. I also gave Rusk an outline of the Bajpai-Chipman discussion on December 24th and of the contents of the message which you sent Chipman yesterday (your EX-2709).[85] He has received no report of their own approach to Peking mentioned in my WA-3360 of December 23rd.

5. Incidentally, the President's early return to Washington yesterday and meeting last night with his chief advisers was not because of the receipt of any fresh news requiring decisions but because he wanted to dodge a political dinner in Kansas City last night.

1. Cease-Fire Group met this morning to consider alternative draft prepared by Rau, text of which is given in my immediately following teletype. I told Rau and Entezam that I would send you this text immediately, and we agreed that, unless you wished major revisions to be made in the draft, there would be no further meeting of the Group until 11.00 a.m. on Tuesday morning, January 2nd, at which time it was assumed you would be present. I said that if you did wish major revisions to be made I would get in touch with them and let them know your views. It was agreed that the Chairman of the First Committee should be informed that the Group would be ready to report at a meeting on Wednesday, January 3rd, if he cared to call the Committee for that date. We also agreed that the report should be ready for circulation at that meeting, but should not be distributed before hand. It was assumed that after hearing the report the Committee might wish to adjourn to study it.

2. In the draft report, as Rau presented it this morning, the first sentence of paragraph 5 referred to "the appropriate authorities on the other side". I expressed some misgivings about this phrase, and it was decided to substitute the expression "the appropriate Chinese authorities".

3. Rau had also included in his original draft the following sentence at the beginning of paragraph 10: "The Group has not yet succeeded in getting in touch with the North Korea military authorities." I said that I thought that either reference of any kind should be omitted to the fact that no contact had been made with the North Korean military authorities, or that, if such a reference were included, an explanation should also be included. I said that, according to my understanding, the Group had felt that, whatever the status of Chinese forces in North Korea, volunteer or otherwise, it was clear that no progress could be made in establishing a cease-fire or arranging for subsequent negotiations unless the cooperation of the Chinese authorities in Peking were secured. For this reason the Group had not thought it useful to make contact with the North Korean authorities. Rau and Entezam then suggested that all reference to the North Korean military authorities should be omitted from the report and agreed that, if a question was raised concerning the fact that the Group had not sought to approach them, the explanation I had suggested should be offered.

Following is text of draft resolution considered at meeting of Cease Fire-Group this morning.

On December 14th, 1950, the General Assembly adopted the following resolution which had been sponsored by thirteen Asian Powers:

"The General Assembly,

"Viewing with grave concern the situation in the Far East,

"Anxious that immediate steps should be taken to prevent the conflict in Korea spreading to other areas and to put an end to the fighting in Korea itself, and that further steps should then be taken for a peaceful settlement of existing issues in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

"Requests the President of the General Assembly to constitute a Group of three persons, including himself, to determine the basis on which a satisfactory cease-fire in Korea can be arranged and to make recommendations to the General Assembly as soon as possible."

2. In pursuance of the resolution, the President forthwith constituted a group consisting of himself, Mr. L.B. Pearson of Canada and Sir Benegal Rau of India, and announced this fact to the General Assembly. The Group met almost immediately afterwards and decided to associate the Secretary-General of the United Nations as closely as possible with its work.

3. A copy of the resolution was sent on December 15th to Ambassador Wu, the representative of the Peking Government who was then in New York.

4. On December 16th, as a first step in carrying out its task, the Group consulted the representatives of the Unified Command as to what they considered to be a satisfactory basis for a cease-fire. The proposals which they made are set forth in Annex I† to this report.

5. The Group then attempted to consult the appropriate Chinese authorities and, for this purpose, sent a message by hand to Ambassador Wu and repeated it by cable to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China. The text of this message is reproduced below. (Text to be inserted.)†

6. On December 16th, the President, acting on behalf of the Group, had availed himself of the good offices of the Swedish delegation to transmit through the Swedish Embassy in Peking a request to the Central People's Government that Ambassador Wu be instructed to stay on in New York and discuss with the Group the possibility of arranging a cease-fire. The reply to the request, communicated to the President on December 21st through the same channel, was as follows: (text to be inserted).† The reply itself indicates the nature of the original message.

7. On December 18th, Mr. Pearson, on behalf of the Group, submitted a brief preliminary account of its activities to the First Committee, hoping that a fuller report would be made in the near future.

8. On December 19th, acting on a recommendation from the sponsors of the twelve-Power resolution introduced in the First Committee on December 12th, the Group sent another message to the Foreign Minister of the Central People's Government. This was intended to remove certain misunderstandings said to have arisen out of the separation of the twelve-Power resolution from the thirteen-Power resolution adopted by the General Assembly on December 14th. The text of the message is given below. (Text to be inserted).†

9. On December 23rd, the President of the General Assembly, in his capacity as such, received from the Foreign Minister of the Central People's Government the text of a statement issued by the latter in Peking on December 22nd explaining the attitude of the Central People's Government on the resolution constituting the Cease-Fire Group and on the peaceful settlement of the Korean question. This document is reproduced in Annex II.† It appears to be in the nature of an answer to the Group's message of December 16th. The replies so far received from the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China do not enable the Group to make any recommendations as to the basis of a cease-fire prior to a settlement of "existing issues". The Group therefore regrets its inability to make any recommendations on the subject.

Your EX-2716 of December 27th, United Nations action on Korean issues.

1. I have had a long talk with Hickerson, who read me various telegrams and memoranda. This message describes instructions sent yesterday to the United States delegation in New York which apply only in case no massive Chinese attack takes place before the debate is resumed in the United Nations. My following messages describe the current line of thinking in the event such an attack occurs and the reasons which have led to the conclusions reached.

2. If no Chinese attack has taken place when the Political Committee meets on January 3rd, the position to be adopted, in consultation with other delegations, is as follows:

(a) If there is a strong Asian demand for this course, the United States will acquiesce in discussion first of the 12-Power resolution proposing negotiations, provided that it is laid down that the Committee to be set up under this resolution would not meet before a cease-fire is in effect, and provided that the composition of the Committee is satisfactory.[86] It is suggested that the members might be appointed by the President and approved by the Assembly, and it is stated that the Peking Government should be included.

[86] Voir Documents sur la crise coréenne, p. 21./See Documents on the Korean Crisis, p. 19.

(b) The 6-Power resolution vetoed in the Security Council should be adopted either before or after the discussion of the 12-Power resolution. If the 12-Power resolution comes first, an interval might be left before consideration of the 6-Power resolution. The 6-Power resolution should be modified only to accord with the current factual situation.

(c) In any event, even if no new Chinese attack occurs, there should be some United Nations condemnation of the Chinese aggression which has already taken place against the United Nations forces in Korea. What should be done in this respect should await the Chinese response to the action proposed in the other two resolutions.

3. A heavy Chinese and North Korean attack is, however, expected in the near future and this would so change the situation that a different course ought to be adopted, as described in my following telegrams.

1. Hickerson said that in the event of a massive Chinese attack in Korea they proposed to discuss further United Nations action with a number of free countries, including those with forces in Korea. What they would suggest meets the approval of Acheson, Dulles, Austin, Rusk and others, and would be on the following lines:

2. A determined effort by the Chinese to drive the United Nations forces out of Korea would constitute an aggression more serious than that originally committed by North Korea. In such circumstances the free world must show a united will to withstand aggression. The United Nations cannot ignore it or it will be digging its own grave, just as the helpless inaction of the League of Nations towards Japanese aggression in Manchuria in 1931 robbed the league of its authority. If big aggressors are able to achieve their objects with impunity, the world order we are seeking to create is in direct peril.

3. The hard fact is, however, that for the free peoples to embark on war with Communist China could only lead to disaster. The motives which should inspire their action are as follows:

(a) They must show the unity of opinion of the free world. This might not change the course of events in Korea, but it should have a restraining influence on other adventures in aggression which might be undertaken by the Chinese, especially if stout resistance in Korea continues.

(b) They should aim at limiting the military potential of China for action in Korea by denying, as the United States has already done, any supplies and material assistance to Communist China.

(c) They should seek to strengthen the uniting spirit and will of the free peoples as an act of general defence against Communist power in the world.

(d) They should make it clear that none of them has any imperialist design in Asia, that all desire a peaceful settlement in Korea, and that the door to negotiation is not closed.

4. This should lead to the adoption by the General Assembly of a resolution embodying the following actions:

(a) The Communist Government in Peking must be declared guilty of aggression, and efforts must be continued to repel the aggression in Korea, especially by continued military resistance by the United Nations forces, with the purpose of seeking to show that the Chinese cannot win an unequivocable victory.

(b) The Assembly should propose individual and collective measures to weaken the will of the Chinese and to make it clear that the Korean adventure is detrimental to Chinese national interests. Sanctions should not be proposed in the first place.

5. The resolution should follow the following pattern: it should note the fact of Chinese aggression and declare China guilty of the act of aggression; it should call on all members not to aid the aggressor; it might continue the Cease-Fire Committee as an agency for good offices and mediation; it should request the Collective Measures Committee to recommend measures which could be taken by all. The measures which the United States would advocate in the Collective Measures Committee would include the breaking of diplomatic relations with China, an embargo on all exports and shipping to the mainland, and the freezing of Chinese assets.

6. Nothing should be done on the United Nations side to lead to any extension of the area of fighting. If the area is extended it should come about only as a result of Chinese action to this end, such as a massive air offensive from Manchuria against the United Nations forces. No military action should be undertaken against the Chinese mainland.

7. Hickerson said it was believed that United Nations action on these lines would deter aggressive action by the Chinese elsewhere. If, however, there were a move against Hong Kong or Indo-China, the whole question would have to be reassessed.

8. If events overtake the six-Power resolution now before the Political Committee, priority should be given to debate on a resolution on the lines given above.

1. Hickerson gave me a long explanation of the reasoning which had led to the adoption of the position therein outlined. He said that we must avoid falling into the booby-trap which the Russians had set to lure us into all-out war with China. While avoiding this the free world must not pretend that Chinese aggression did not happen. Between these extremes we had to find an answer. The issue was bigger than the United Nations. If what was at stake was no more than the preservation of the United Nations in its present form, he might not feel moved to argue as strongly.

2. He is deeply concerned over the effect on public opinion in the United States if any weaker action than that suggested is taken — and especially if it is taken at the instance of the countries most closely associated with them. It took 25 years to convince public opinion in the United States that a system of collective security was in their interests. The results would be gone over night; the policy advocated by Mr. Hoover[87] which was winning much support would secure many new converts; although the North Atlantic Treaty would not be repudiated, its military program would be destroyed by the demand for concentration on home defence; and the outcome might conceivably be the loss by attrition of both the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty. He thought that an early consequence might well be the departure of the United States from the United Nations.

3. I think that there is substance in this view, although possibly not quite so much as Hickerson gives it. Certainly the Hoover speech has brought into view the extent of disillusion with the United Nations and the doubts whether heavy commitments in Western Europe should be made. If action against Chinese aggression is taken, over United States opposition, which is substantially weaker than what they now advocate, I think it would swell the ranks of those arguing for a drastic restriction of international commitments, especially in Europe.

4. Hickerson went on to argue that the central issue was the very fact of aggression by China and that other disputed questions in the Far East were relatively minor. Differences on such issues as Formosa and the recognition of the Peking Government should not blind any of the free countries to the naked fact that the [87] Herbert Hoover, ancien président des États-Unis (républicain), 1929-1933.

Herbert Hoover, former President of United States (Republican), 1929-1933.

Chinese Communists have committed aggression and have blatantly flouted the community of nations.

5. At the end of our talk I raised with him the procedural question mentioned in my WA-3398 of yesterday whether the crossing en masse by the Chinese of the 38 parallel did not constitute a fresh act of aggression which should be discussed first in the Security Council. Hickerson refused to accept this view, saying that the Security Council had already considered Chinese intervention in the six-Power resolution vetoed by the Russians, and that if they invaded South Korea in force their aggression was all of one piece, the invasion of South Korea only making it more heinous. They intend therefore to seek Assembly action.

6. He asked me to report these views fully to you, adding that up to the present they had only had talks with the British on these lines.

Following for Riddell from Pearson, Begins: Your telegram 761 — cease-fire report.

Confirming my telephone conversation of a few moments ago, apart from the merely textual changes suggested to the draft report, I am most anxious that it should not be possible to interpret the report so as to give the impression that the Unified Command and the Chinese Communist authorities were considered by us to be on the same basis, or that the attitude of the former had anything to do with our inability to make any recommendation. I realize that the report in its present form could not reasonably be construed in that sense, but I would like to make this clear beyond any possible doubt. It seems to me that this might be achieved by associating ourselves with the Unified Command proposals, as providing a reasonable basis for discussion. Possibly this could be done by changes to the last sentence of paragraph 4, which might then read somewhat as follows:

"The proposals which the group felt constituted a reasonable and satisfactory basis for discussion are set forth, etc. ..."

Also, the last sentence of the draft, in paragraph 9, might be altered to read:

"The group regrets that the position taken by the Central People's Government of China has, so far, prevented a cease-fire arrangement based on the proposals of the Unified Command being considered. It therefore feels that no recommendations in regard to a cease-fire can usefully be made by it at this time."

Repeat Permdel No. 1; London No. 1.
Following for Wrong from Pearson, Begins: Your telegrams 3202, 3403, and 3404. United Nations action on Korean issues.

2. These give us a very valuable, useful and, on the whole, reassuring indication of United States views of what should be done next week at the meetings of the Political Committee. You might wish to have my preliminary reactions. Later when I have had a chance to discuss the matter in New York I will be able to give you firmer views.

3. The procedure suggested in telegram No. 3402 in the unlikely event of there being no serious fighting is, I think, on the whole, satisfactory. I would hope that the 12-power resolution could be disposed of first, and that in its discussion the United States representative could make a strong and reassuring statement regarding their willingness to discuss with the United Nations commission proposed, which would include Chinese Communist membership, all relevant questions, including Formosa, once a cease-fire has been arranged.

4. My only reservation to the procedure suggested in telegram No. 3402 has to do with paragraph 3 (c). I am not sure what is meant by the suggestion that even if no new heavy Chinese attack occurs, there should be some U.N. condemnation of the Chinese aggression which has already taken place. It seems to me that action of this kind might be confined to passing the 6-Power Resolution, and that a further formal U.N. condemnation would not, in this event, be essential and might therefore be neither wise nor useful.

5. If the Chinese Communists and North Koreans have mounted a full-scale attack, then I agree that it would be difficult to avoid declaring Peking to be an aggressor, emphasizing in any resolution to that end, that once the aggression ended, or was defeated, discussion of far eastern questions must follow.

6. However, the value of any resolution naming Communist China as an aggressor will depend on the measure of support it receives in the Assembly. If, for example, no Asian country votes for it, the resolution would widen the gap between the Asian democratic states and the Western democracies — a gap which has happily been narrowing lately. It would, therefore, tend to weaken dangerously our support in the very part of the world which is our weakest point.

7. Every possible effort should, therefore, be made before any such resolution is introduced to try to reach agreement with the Asian states. With this object in view, I might, on my arrival in New York, find out from the Indians whether they have any suggestions for a wording of such a resolution which they might be able to accept, and which would be satisfactory to Washington. I have no illusions, however, about the difficulty of this.

8. There are also obvious difficulties about tying any resolution on aggression to the crossing of the 38th parallel, which certain spokesmen for the United Nations said, some months ago, had ceased to exist. It would probably be preferable to relate the resolution to a large-scale attack and the abortive efforts for a cease-fire. The principal difficulty that I see about this course is that it leaves the determining factor to the judgment of General MacArthur. The mechanical introduction of a resolution condemning the Chinese as aggressors on the receipt of a report from General MacArthur that a "massive" Chinese offensive had taken place might not be calculated to rally support for the resolution in certain quarters. I have been wondering whether the United Nations Commission in Korea could be associated with the responsibility for reporting on the existence of such an offensive but I am doubtful whether they would have either the opportunities for observation or the capabilities necessary for this purpose.

9. The steps proposed, if and when China has been declared an aggressor, seem to me to be reasonable ones, but the difficulty will be, of course, in stopping at any particular point once we have started. The reference to the Collective Measures Committee may be a very useful device to have these matters discussed calmly and in private.

10. As I have already indicated, I feel certain that a good many states, especially Asian states, will be reluctant to take formal action against the Chinese Communists, and that, therefore, we should do everything we can to impress on them in any statements that we make that the reason for a resolution declaring Peking guilty of aggression is purely on the ground that they have attempted to resolve differences by the use of arms against United Nations forces which are already in Korea to defeat an aggression; that any such declaration of aggression is not concerned with endorsing or condemning the Far Eastern policies of any state, nor does it give the United States, or any other state, a blank cheque in the Pacific. It is merely a condemnation of the unauthorized use of force. If the discussion can be concentrated on this particular issue, then it may be possible to secure a much larger majority than would otherwise be the case.

11. I feel sure that there will be considerable uneasiness that any political action taken by the United Nations against Communist China may somehow or other strengthen MacArthur's position, or suggest that he should be the agency for making it effective. There would be great opposition to this.

12. I think that Hickerson takes a somewhat too optimistic view of the effect for the future of the action which we may have to take. We may not be able to avoid it in the circumstances as stated, but I do not think the results will be good if there is a large abstaining vote which would confirm an impression, already too strong, that collective action in the United Nations results entirely from United States initiative which some other countries follow almost automatically. There is almost as great a danger to the United Nations in this development as there would be in no action at all being taken. That is why the tactics to be followed during the next few weeks may be almost as important as the policies themselves.

SECRET Washington, February 23, 1950

Dear Mr. Pearson:

We discussed in Ottawa last week the question of what, if anything, might be done to lessen the international deadlock with the Soviet Union. I have been thinking a good deal about this and have had talks about it with, among others, Messrs. Rusk and Hickerson since I returned to Washington. It is also the subject of very active discussion in the press.

The public debate on the question was stimulated particularly by the President's announcement in January of the decision to seek actively to develop the hydrogen bomb. The appalling possibilities of such a weapon led to a good deal of soul searching and a number of suggestions advanced by public men. The more notable of these include Senator McMahon's proposal for a peace settlement with Russia baited with a worldwide economic recovery scheme to cost the taxpayers of this country $50 billions which would be found by reducing defence appropriations by two-thirds. Senator Tydings followed by repeating the old suggestion for a general disarmament conference. Mr. Stassen has now produced the idea of a bipartisan and apparently bilateral general conference with the Russians, and Mr. Churchill has suggested that the wartime practice of meetings between the Heads of the Soviet, British and American Governments should be revived.

The Administration through Mr. Acheson and the President himself has pointed out the difficulties and deficiencies of all these schemes although they have not closed the door completely for a meeting of Heads of Governments. The chief statements of the Administration's attitude were made by Mr. Acheson in his press conference of February 8th, a transcript of which appeared in the New York Times of February 9th, by the President in an exclusive interview with Mr. Arthur Krock which was reported in the same paper on February 15th, and by the President once more in a speech in Alexandria yesterday, of which the text appears in today's papers. The general line is that they are prepared to consider any methods which are likely to produce good results but that certain conditions must be met. They will not negotiate with the Russians alone on matters of deep concern to other countries. They do not believe that any sweeping proposals, like those of Senator McMahon and Senator Tydings could of themselves produce results. Success can only come from strength because, as Mr. Acheson put it, "Agreements with the Soviet Union are useful when those agreements register or record an existing situation of fact." To talk of a general settlement is futile because of the total absence of common aims and common moral standards between the Soviet Government and the democracies.

It is becoming clear to me that something fairly dramatic will have to be done before long if only to satisfy public opinion. I think that the methods which might be adopted fall into three main classes: (1) negotiations might be started outside the United Nations either directly between the United States and the Soviet Union or including one or two other countries as Mr. Churchill desires; (2) an effort might be made to abate tension and reach some sort of working agreement through United Nations machinery after careful preliminary negotiation; (3) plans might be concerted for a bold approach by the Western powers at the next Assembly in the virtual certainty that the Soviet Delegation would be in a small minority.

I have not much to say about the first possibility as yet. It could include a lot of different tactics from the convening of a Big Three conference to the undertaking of private talks with Soviet representatives, such as the Jessup-Malik talks which led to the lifting of the Berlin blockade. The Jessup-Malik precedent, it seems to me, can be applied most effectively only in relation to a particular situation in which the Russians desire an agreement because they are not strong enough to maintain their attitude. A high-level meeting of Heads of Governments or of Foreign Ministers does not appear to me to hold much prospect of success in present conditions, and the wider its agenda the more resentment would it cause among countries not represented.

The second and third approaches could not be made so long as the conflict over the recognition of the Communist Government in China persists. The present state of affairs in United Nations bodies is not so much like "Hamlet" without the Prince of Denmark as like "Faust" without the Prince of Darkness. We must therefore assume that that situation will be resolved by the next Assembly in any planning for action at that time.

Mr. Rusk is deliberating on a plan which falls into the second category. It would require careful preparatory discussion with a group of the democratic countries and also with the Russians. It is as yet vague in outline. It is based on the fact that both sides are bound by Articles 1 and 2 of the Charter and that all members of the United Nations ostensibly accept these articles as the basis of their foreign policy. He thinks that these articles might provide the occasion, possibly at a special conference, for reviewing the existing international situation in the light of the purposes and principles of the United Nations and attempting to arrive at some sort of a general agreement with the Russians on their application to particular situations. He remarked to me that the person who could best take an initiative to bring about a realistic discussion of this sort was the Secretary General of the United Nations, but he seems to have little hope that Mr. Lie could act effectively. He added that if you held that office something promising might be started.

Some thought is also being given in the State Department to action in the Assembly falling into the third category — that is, designed to win another propaganda battle with the Russians. I cannot say that I regard tactics of this sort as particularly profitable, but we may hear more of them. A current idea is that a group of the Western powers might propose a very generous disarmament scheme covering both atomic weapons and conventional armaments, which the Russians would be certain to refuse because it must involve effective inspection but which would nevertheless commend itself to public opinion of most of the rest of the world. I am not myself much attracted by any plan for the acceptance of which there is no hope.

There are a few oddments which it may be useful to add. Mr. Kennan's ideas for atomic disarmament through agreement to give up all but experimental installations has little, if any, support inside the State Department and none, I think, in the Department of Defense. Even if it were possible to reach agreement on renouncing the use of atomic energy as a source of power (which is almost certainly not the case), a scheme on Kennan's lines could not be accepted without effective inspection inside the Soviet Union.

Mr. Lippmann has been putting forward another proposal which is equally unlikely to be supported. This is the idea of creating a neutral bloc between the Soviet sphere and the West, running in a great arc from Sweden and Finland through Greece, the Middle East, the Indian Peninsula, perhaps to the Philippines. The trouble with this, of course, is that neutrality has become an empty term which is no shield from attack whenever it is in the interests of a great power to make use of neutral territory. Neutrality of this sort might conceivably be maintained for some time in certain areas, particularly in southeast Asia, but this would be because of geographical situation and not because of any international agreement.

I am sending a copy of this letter to the Acting Under-Secretary for his information.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

I am sending by today's bag a semi-official letter to you reporting a talk with Dean Rusk on the possibilities of a new negotiation with the Russians. In that letter I mention that Rusk remarked that the State Department was constantly sounding out the Russians to find if there was on their side any indication of a readiness to change their attitude. He said that I could tell you but you alone that he had within the last few days spent an evening with Malik in New York with a view to discovering whether there was any evidence of a desire to reach a modus vivendi. He had drawn a complete blank. The only matter Malik wanted to talk about was the admission of the Chinese Communists to the United Nations.

I also refer in my other letter to Senator McMahon. Rusk said that before making his recent speeches (those proposing an enormous global Marshall Plan and suggesting a new effort to reach an atomic agreement following discussion in the Atlantic Council) the Senator had spent several evenings with him or other senior officers of the State Department. He had not taken in these talks the line which he put forward in his speeches, but had appeared to be in agreement with the point of view expressed by Dean Acheson. This change of front is one of the reasons why Rusk thinks that McMahon is not averse to the prospect of a preventive war.

Yours sincerely,
HUME [WRONG]

Dear Mr. Pearson:

This letter is a sequel to my letter to you of February 23rd on the question of what, if anything, might be done to lessen tension with the Soviet Union. I took Mr. MacDermot to see Mr. Rusk this afternoon and we spent three-quarters of an hour principally discussing this subject.

I asked Mr. Rusk whether he thought that the Administration would be able to resist public pressure for some sort of an attempt to reopen negotiations with the Soviet Union on some, at least, of the main outstanding issues.[1] He said that those who were proposing a new effort, by a meeting of heads of states or by a special international conference or by a meeting of the Security Council attended by Foreign Ministers or in other ways, could be divided into two classes. There were those who hopefully believed that a modus vivendi with the Russians, if not a broader settlement, could be achieved through employing one or other of these methods. This group merged, however, with another group who had come to the conclusion that a showdown with the Russians was now called for, that war sooner or later was inevitable, and that a "preventive war" now was preferable to waiting on events;[2] they therefore favoured an impressive international negotiation in the virtual certainty that it would break down and precipitate a violent crisis. His emphasis on the existence of this group and on the dangers attending their aims was new to me. He urged me to pass on to you the grave apprehension felt by the State Department about the risks involved in undertaking a negotiation of this sort.[3] It could be represented plausibly and with considerable popular appeal as a peace move, whereas in fact the prospects were that it would greatly increase the dangers of early war.

I think that Mr. Rusk did not mean to imply that the motives of some of those whom he would put in the second group are as Machiavellian as this description might lead one to believe. He remarked, for example, that Senator McMahon appeared to belong in both groups, by which I assume he meant that the Senator thought that there was some possibility of reducing tension by a new approach but was ready to face the consequences of the outbreak of war if the approach was made and failed.

Mr. Rusk said that the Department of State through various channels was constantly sounding out the Russians to see if they were ready to talk on any of the outstanding issues.[4] These discussions had produced absolutely no result, with the exception that they wanted to talk about the admission of the Chinese Communists to the United Nations, a question which is only distantly related to the central issues. He believes that, as Mr. Acheson has said, it is only possible to make advances in negotiating with the Russians when they themselves wish an agreement, as was the case over the Berlin blockade.[5] He is not sure that the Russians are even ready to accept the conception of a world made up of a number of sovereign states or, if they do accept this conception, what states they would be prepared to include. In support of this view, he pointed to the subjection and isolation of the Satellites, and to the evidences of a desire similarly to isolate China from contact with the Western world.

He emphasized that this does not mean that the United States is taking an inflexible position, and he read us a passage from the speech which Mr. Acheson is to give tomorrow in California on tensions between the United States and the Soviet Union. You will probably have seen the speech before this letter reaches you. The basic point is that the complete unwillingness of the Soviet Government to co-operate[6] or to compromise on any of the major issues at present dooms to failure any effort on the part of the Western Powers to achieve satisfactory results through a general negotiation and that such a failure would bring the world to the brink of war. If anyone can, however, by any means find an opening which looks promising, it should be followed up with promptness and energy.[7]

He then repeated what he had mentioned to me before, that if the Secretary General were not Mr. Lie, he would perhaps be the best equipped person to explore the possibilities. He thought that if you were to be elected President of the Assembly, you could undertake this role. Someone with an international mandate would have a better chance of success than the representative of any government.

This interpretation of the situation rests, of course, upon the deductions drawn from Soviet behaviour. In support of it, Mr. Rusk cited such facts as the refusal of the Russians to go on with the Austrian Treaty (confirmed, he said, by information recently received), their evident policy of perpetuating the separation of Germany and of making Eastern Germany into another Satellite, the trials and purges in the Satellite states, and the treatment of Western diplomatic representatives throughout the Soviet sphere. He placed no faith whatever in the recent spate of assertions in Moscow about the ability of the Communist and the Capitalist worlds to live indefinitely side by side; these declarations, he thought, were directed at confusing democratic opinion and had no more in them than that.

Mr. Rusk agreed that if the Russians have resumed their places at the United Nations by the next Assembly, there will have to be a debate on the major issues.[8] He is clearly not optimistic that this would be more than a propaganda battle. A propaganda battle waged once more in the accustomed forum of the Assembly, however, does not contain the same danger of leading to a sharp crisis, as would a failure to reach any agreement at a special conference of some sort.

He also referred to the danger, which Mr. Webb had mentioned to me earlier in the week, that the defeatist spirit in Western Europe might increase and might result, if there were a showdown, in a very powerful wave of popular sentiment in favour of attempted neutrality, involving a repudiation of the obligations undertaken in the North Atlantic Treaty. I asked him whether he considered that it would be desirable at the projected meeting of the North Atlantic Council some weeks hence for the Council to discuss the present deadlock and the means of overcoming it. He is dubious of the value of such a discussion and he considers that while the Council should deal with matters of substance, it ought to concern itself with the strengthening of the defences of the North Atlantic area rather than with the general world situation. He pointed out that the North Atlantic countries would get into a lot of trouble with their friends outside the circle if the Council sought to assume some of the functions given to the Security Council by the Charter. He said, however, that the Council should, in his judgment, extend the scope of its discussions outside the purely military sphere and indicated that the State Department would be glad to consider ideas for its agenda.[9]

SECRET Geneva, March 18, 1950

Dear Mr. MacDermot,

I have had forwarded on to me here from London your letter of March 6th,† to which you attached copy of a letter to Mr. Pearson from Mr. Wrong following up a discussion between them which took place in Ottawa in the middle of February about the question of what, if anything, might be done to lessen the international deadlock with the Soviet Union.

I note that you refer to the Minister's statement in the House of Commons on March 3rd, but as the Hansard of that date has not yet reached Geneva I shall have to give you my comments without the benefit of reading the Minister's statement. I have read, however, a press summary of what he said in the House of Commons and am therefore familiar with the general position he took.

Needless to say, I have read over Mr. Wrong's letter with great interest and am in substantial agreement with most of what he has written. I fear, however, that I do not see much possibility of any useful steps being taken in the near future to lessen the international deadlock with the Soviet Union. Moreover, I am very conscious of the dangers inherent in the proposals recently advanced, including those which are referred to by Mr. Wrong. If Mr. Churchill, during the recent election campaign, was not above exploiting the deep-rooted desire for peace inherent in all our countries, we can expect that the Soviet Government will be constantly looking for opportunities to exploit these same sentiments. Consequently, all proposals for discussions, whether or not the discussions are confined to a few countries or to many, present the great danger that the Russians will use the occasion for propaganda purposes and as a means of weakening the will to resistance on the part of the Western powers. This danger is very much greater if the initiative in bringing about the discussions is taken by one of the Western powers, because that power then has a major interest in making a success of the discussions.

[9] We are working on this

It is for the above reasons that I hope Mr. Wrong is mistaken when he writes that something fairly dramatic will have to be done before long if only to satisfy public opinion. What this means is that public opinion is veering towards appeasement in some form or another. The situation reminds me of that which existed in the United Kingdom when the peace vote was taken which led directly to the disastrous appeasement of Munich. The result of the peace vote made Mr. Chamberlain act as a good politician but as a bad statesman. We must at all costs avoid a repetition of these events.

Mr. Wrong, in his letter, outlines three main classes of methods which might be adopted to do something fairly dramatic. The first of these is that negotiations might be started outside the United Nations, either directly between the United States and the Soviet Union, or including one or two other countries. This method is open to all the objections I have already indicated, and I think would be fatal if the initiative in undertaking the negotiations should be taken by the United States. I fully share the opinion expressed by Mr. Wrong that the Jessup-Malik precedent can be applied effectively only in relation to a particular situation in which the Russians desire an agreement because they are not strong enough to maintain their attitude. Moreover, the Russians on that occasion took the initiative rather than the Western powers. I am quite sure that Mr. Churchill was not sincere in making his proposal during the election campaign because he, more than anyone else, must know what little prospect there would be of success resulting from a high-level meeting, particularly one in which he was a participant.

The second method described by Mr. Wrong is that an effort might be made to abate tension and reach some sort of working agreement through United Nations machinery after careful preliminary negotiation. A lot would depend upon what sort of working agreement was aimed at and how far it is to the interest of the Russians that tension should be abated. Certainly we can rule out any sort of working arrangement for disarmament or the outlawing of hydrogen or atomic bombs if international inspection in the Soviet Union is involved. If there is one thing more than anything else that I am certain of, from my experience in Russia, it is that the Russians will never agree to any form of international inspection which involves inspectors from other countries moving about their country with that degree of freedom essential to the effectiveness of the inspection. It is a cardinal principle of their policy that foreigners should not learn too much about the Soviet Union. They are more frightened of foreigners finding out how weak they are than of their finding out how strong they are.

Mr. Rusk appears to have in mind a conference for reviewing the existing international situation in the light of the purposes and principles of the United Nations and attempting to arrive at some sort of a general agreement with the Russians on their application to particular situations. I find it difficult to think of any particular situation in which it would be possible to reach an agreement with the Russians that they could be expected to live up to. A special conference for this purpose would be particularly dangerous because of the use the Russians could make of this opportunity for propaganda and for channelling the sentiments for peace in the direction of appeasement. There would be less, but still great, objection to such a subject being discussed as an item on the agenda of the General Assembly. Probably the only form in which this approach could be considered to be free of objection would be if the move were made solely on the initiative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, but, as Mr. Wrong points out, Mr. Rusk seems to have little hope that Mr. Lie could act effectively.

Possibly the effectiveness of the use of the United Nations machinery depends upon the personality of the Secretary-General. No doubt Mr. Lie is counting on the inability of the two sides to agree on anyone else and that he will continue in office. Perhaps the least dangerous of all topics for discussion with the Russians might be informal conversations on the subject of a successor to Mr. Lie.

I do not believe it would be possible, under present circumstances, to reach agreement with the Russians on the situation in any particular area, e.g. Indo-China. We have to consider the realities of the situation, which is that the autocratically-governed little principality of Moscow, located in the area in which the main rivers of Russia have their source, and therefore at the crossroads of an enormous territory, has expanded during the past four hundred years until it now covers nearly the whole portion of the Eurasian land mass which is inaccessible to sea or air power. In other words, the Russians are in possession of that "heart land" which Sir Halford Mackinder[10] regarded as so strategic. They are in possession of interior lines of communication which stood the Germans in such good stead in two world wars. The only parts of this vast area in which Western power can neutralize Soviet power is on the peninsulas jutting out from the "heartland", such as Western Europe, Korea, Malaya, the Indian sub-continent and the Middle East. It is futile to think that the Russians would give up these advantages by concluding an agreement in respect of any particular area unless it is one in which a clash might involve them in that major war for which they are not yet ready. Moreover, their whole philosophy indicates that the more they can promote tension between themselves and the Western world, the speedier will be that break-down of capitalism on which they base all their calculations.

Opposed to the Soviet philosophy is the Kennan doctrine of the containment of the Soviet Union until the corrosive forces within the Soviet system begin to work and bring about the downfall of that system. This has seemed to me to be like waiting in the hope that the Soviet system will collapse before Western civilization, but I can see no alternative. I have been impressed with the recent articles by [10] Sir Halford John Mackinder, théoricien de la géopolitique dont la thèse a été publiée en 1904, affirmait que la puissance qui contrôle le coeur du continent eurasien, soit la Russie et l'Allemagne, pouvait dominer le monde à moins que les pays « périphériques » ne se concertent pour l'en empêcher.

Sir Halford John Mackinder, a geo-political theorist whose 'heartland' thesis was originally published in 1904, postulated that the power which controls the 'heartland' of the Eurasian landmass, consisting of Russia and Germany, could dominate the world unless effectively countered by the 'rimland'.

George Kennan on the subject of "Is War with Russia Inevitable" and I agree with all that he writes. Certainly one derives the conclusion from these articles that it would not be wise for the Western powers to take the initiative to lessen the international deadlock with the Soviet Union.

It is clear that something more positive than a mere policy of "wait and see" is required. It is because the United States has had a positive policy that the tension with the Soviet Union has arisen and, from this angle, the tension is a reflection on the success of that positive policy. We have, however, now reached a crossroads in which vital decisions have to be taken. So far as Europe is concerned, much would seem to hinge upon the possibility of bringing about closer political and economic integration of the countries of Western Europe. This can be done only under United Kingdom leadership and a change of heart on the part of the United Kingdom is urgently required. Possibly the recurrence of financial and economic difficulties for the United Kingdom will bring about that change of heart. What we want to see is a closer association of the countries of Western Europe which will not only be an effective barrier to Soviet aggression but also a strong magnet of attraction for the oppressed peoples in the satellite states, particularly those whose former way of life had more in common with the West than with the East.

As regards the Middle East, the situation is more difficult because the explosive forces are greater and Soviet land power can be more effectively exerted on this area than Western sea or air power. Nevertheless, the oil resources of the Middle East are so vital to the West that it is probably realised by the Soviet leaders that any serious threat to this area would entail the risk of bringing about that major war for which the Soviet Union is not yet ready or likely to be ready for at least a decade.

When we come to Asia the advantages seem to be all on the side of the Soviet Union. Unfortunately, we have chosen as our testing ground an area in which the Communists will be appearing as attempting to free the people of Indo-China from colonial domination, whereas the United States will be on the side of colonialism. However, the die has been cast and there seems to be no alternative to a trial of strength in Indo-China. If not successful there, there is no telling how far in Asia communist expansion may go, and even the policy of bolstering up existing regimes with economic assistance may prove to be insufficient. I cannot, however, see any possibility of reaching effective agreement with the Soviet Union in respect of any of these areas in Asia.

I now come to the third of the three classes of methods referred to by Mr. Wrong. This is that plans might be concerted for a bold approach by the Western powers at the next General Assembly in the virtual certainty that the Soviet delegations will be in a small minority. I feel I cannot condemn too strongly this proposed approach. It would be lowering ourselves to the tactics of the Russians. Even if we won the propaganda battle, the tactics would appear so obvious that the Western powers would be discredited and the forces of peace directed towards appeasement would be greatly strengthened. It is one thing to seek victory in a propaganda battle started by the Russians, but quite another to start that battle ourselves. By doing so, we are rendering the worst possible service to our cause. There is nothing that so gratifies the Soviet leaders as to see the Western powers afraid of the Soviet Union. Conscious as they are of their own weakness rather than of their own strength, they relish all the talk that is now going on about seeking a modus vivendi with them. We cannot prevent all this agitation and free publicity for the Soviet Union but we should do everything possible to play it down. The less talk there is about the Soviet menace the better it would be. Above all, we should not play into their hands by giving them an opportunity of being still more talked about, as would be the case if we deliberately sought a propaganda battle within the United Nations.

The United Nations probably is the only organization which can eventually bring about a better understanding between the Soviet Union and the Western world, and for this reason it is worth being kept in being and, if possible, strengthened. The impasse which has been reached over the withdrawal of Soviet representatives from the organs of the United Nations will have to be resolved, but the most feasible method would be for the United States Government gradually to convince both public and congressional opinion of the realities of the situation, which require recognition of the Communists as the government now in power in China, and one with whom it is better to have relations than to carry through the farce of recognizing a regime which the United States itself deserted several years ago. I realize the domestic difficulties of the United States Government, and also the disadvantages of having another communist government among the permanent members of the Security Council, but there is no other solution consistent with the realities of the situation and with using the machinery of the United Nations for the only effective contact now possible with the Soviet world.

I am sorry to have been so discouraging on the prospects of any safe steps being taken to lessen the international deadlock with the Soviet Union, but I find that all those who know the Soviet Union share the view that there is no alternative to continuing the present impasse, although I hope with less free publicity for the Russians than has been accorded them within the last few months.

Yours sincerely,

L.D. WILGRESS

PERSONAL & SECRET Ottawa, March 24, 1950

Dear Hume [Wrong],

I have read with great interest and profit your recent series of letters and despatches on the position of Dean Acheson and the relation between the attacks on him and the State Department and the popular demand for some new effort to negotiate with the Russians. The persecution to which Acheson is being subjected is certainly dangerous and irresponsible. Personally, however, I am more depressed than surprised by it. It seems to me that one of its most lamentable aspects is the failure of anyone of political strength in the United States to stand up for Acheson and the readiness with which he is being written off by some simply because he is assumed now to be a political liability to the administration. It may be that if he can weather the immediate storm, he will emerge with a political following amongst American liberals that will make it more hazardous to beset him in future. In the meantime, however, the prospect of a change at the helm in the State Department in consequence of the insalubrious winds which are now blowing, is dreadful to contemplate.

Meanwhile I am wondering whether Dean [Acheson's] tactics in regard to the demand for some new attempt to approach the Russians have been altogether wise. I fully understand and sympathize with the reluctance of responsible people like him and Rusk to acquiesce in the emotional and sometimes even hysterical clamour which is put up in some quarters for action merely for its own sake. It would, of course, be extremely dangerous to initiate new negotiations with the Russians on any of the fronts which are now deadlocked without there being some real prospect that either the substance of the discussions or the auspices under which they took place would lead to progress. It seems to me however that, as you yourself suggested to Webb in your conversation of March 13, public opinion on this subject may become so assertive that the State Department may be forced, against its will and unprepared, into the course of action which it is now trying to resist. The perils of that situation would exceed even those which now exist. We might well find ourselves faced with some ill-considered and precipitate proposals for new negotiations, in which we could not participate with any confidence. This, as you know, is a recurring danger in Washington and one from which we have suffered in the past on other issues.

There was I thought some evidence of the possibility of this kind of retreat in Dean's suggestions at San Francisco in regard to the Far East. On the one hand he restated the position of the United States on the major issues of the cold war in terms which, while clear and convincing, introduced nothing new to the situation, either in substance or emphasis. On the other hand he took a step of major consequence to us all when he drew or seemed to draw the line of western defence firmly across the southern borders of China and hinted that some kind of Pacific Association should be formed for the purpose of holding this line.[11] Is he really thinking in terms of a Pacific Pact, as Scotty Reston and Norman Smith, for instance, think he is? I for one have very grave doubts whether at the moment an alliance or grouping of this nature would be practicable, and I have even greater doubts about the willingness of the Canadian people to participate in such an alliance. The North Atlantic Treaty is not a fair parallel, for in that case we drew our line around an area of relative stability, within which there was a genuine community of interest, political, economic and cultural. I do not know what in the world we should be letting ourselves in for by attempting a similar experiment in the Pacific or in South East [11] Dean Acheson, "Tensions Between the United States and the Soviet Union," March 16, 1950, U.S. Department of State Bulletin, Volume 22, No. 560, March 27, 1950, pp. 473-8.

Asia, and I would need a lot of convincing that we were not simply being asked to repeat in South East Asia, through an international instrument, policies which the United States had followed with such unhappy consequences in China; and which are not working out too well in Korea.

To revert to the possibility of renewed negotiations with the Russians, I do not think that our public will be content for long merely with the achievements of the Kennan policy of containment, on no matter how wide a front that policy may be successfully applied. The effects of that policy surely are, or should be, a greater sense of confidence in the strength of our own position and we should therefore be prepared to make a renewed effort at settlement with a much greater feeling of assurance that, at least, we can come out of the process in a good light so far as our own public is concerned. I do not, however, think for a moment that there is any point to negotiating simply for the sake of going through the motions in order to satisfy public opinion. I judge from your letters that the two Deans [Acheson and Rusk] reject, or at least are skeptical about all the current proposals — high level meeting, special Assemblies in Moscow or elsewhere, special meetings of the Security Council or a special conference on disarmament — because they are convinced that any of these would simply be activity for its own sake. One can agree with their skepticism on this score, and still wonder if we need conclude that any renewed initiative will necessarily and inevitably be ill-considered and therefore abortive. Is there no chance that, by careful consultation amongst ourselves (by ourselves I mean the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada and possibly France) we could not work out in advance some agreed programme for an approach to the Russians, either on a broad front or in some particular field, that would enable us to get a wedge into the encircling wall of frustration? There would of course have to be extremely careful preparation and agreement both upon our initial positions and upon the positions on which we were prepared to retreat if the Russians showed any disposition to negotiate. Couldn't we take thought together along these lines? It seems to me that if there is any way of avoiding the dangers of a sudden, ineffective and therefore calamitous renewal of discussions through some dramatic gesture designed simply to appease public opinion, it is through a considered policy of the kind I have in mind. Even if it didn't secure any concrete results surely, if it were carefully planned and operated, it might secure important gains in the psychological war.

These paragraphs are of course simply reflections which I send you because I think we must all spend as much time as we can trying to think out a way of getting an oar into the water and doing a little pulling on it, before we are carried over Niagara Falls in something a great deal less secure than a barrel.

Yours sincerely,

MIKE [PEARSON]

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le premier ministre

TOP SECRET Ottawa, April 14, 1950

Late last autumn it was announced that Mr. Phillip Jessup, United States Ambassador at large, would go to the Far East for a meeting of United States diplomatic representatives to be held at Bangkok. At about the same time, arrangements were being completed for the meeting of Commonwealth Foreign Ministers at Ceylon, and Mr. Jessup and I, who were then seeing one another at meetings of the General Assembly, agreed that we should try to meet, either in the Far East or after our return, to exchange our impressions on the situation in that part of the world. As it turned out, our paths did not cross in the Far East, and Mr. Jessup did not return from his travels until late in March. Even before he reached this continent, however, he asked whether it would be possible for us to fulfil the undertaking which we had made to see one another, and it was arranged for us to meet in New York on April 1st and 2nd. As a pretext for going to New York I accepted a long-standing invitation to speak privately to the Council on Foreign Relations, and I do not think that anyone, apart from a few officials, knows that my meeting with Jessup took place. Jessup was accompanied by Dean Rusk, formerly Deputy Under-Secretary of State, with general responsibility for political affairs, and recently appointed Assistant Under-Secretary, with responsibility for the Far East, and Ernest Gross, who is Deputy to Senator Austin as United States representative on the Security Council. Mr. Wrong came up from Washington for the meetings and I was accompanied by Riddell of my office.

2. I was, of course, particularly concerned to learn the impressions which Jessup had formed as a result of his travels in the Far East. We did not, however, confine our discussions to that topic, but made a general review of foreign policy, concluding with a thorough-going analysis of the general topic of relations with the Soviet Union and policy in regard to the United Nations. In general I found the American officials disposed to be confident about the immediate position, particularly in the Far East. They had, however, few concrete suggestions to make about an approach to a solution of any of the current major problems in western diplomacy, and seemed anxious to be given suggestions or advice.

3. In regard to the recognition of the Communist regime in China, Jessup and Rusk made it clear that the United States had no immediate intention of altering its attitude. If anything, American policy in this regard has become more firm. A few weeks ago Acheson was suggesting to Wrong that the reluctance of the United States to recognize the Peiping regime arose largely out of domestic political considerations. According to Jessup, however, the situation in China itself was the matter of primary concern to the U.S. Government. He said they were by no means sure that the Communist Government would succeed in establishing really effective authority over South China and that a prolonged civil war, perhaps even resulting in the emergence of two Chinese governments on the mainland, might ensue. They were anxious, therefore, not to recognize too quickly a government which might, in fact, not be able to make its writ run in large areas of China. Their attitude would also be affected by the treatment the Peiping regime gave United States interests in China. They did not wish to recognize Peiping simply with the object of being rebuffed and insulted. Rusk added that he thought United States policy in regard to the recognition of Peiping should be formulated in terms of the whole situation in Southeast Asia. He and Jessup are apparently optimistic about the possibility of holding the line against the spread of Communism beyond the borders of China, and they are anxious to use all possible means for encouraging the anti-Communist forces on which their policy depends.

4. None of the Americans had anything very useful to suggest in regard to the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations. They were worried and perplexed by the withdrawal of Soviet delegations from United Nations meetings and constantly referred to the additional difficulties in dealing with the Soviet Government caused by its boycott of the organization. They did not, however, think that much permanent harm is being done to the United Nations, for the moment at least, by the situation which has developed because of the rival claims of the two Governments. When I suggested that it would become increasingly embarrassing for us to go on pretending that the Government of Chiang Kai-shek represented the Chinese people, and that in this respect the Russians had a very good propaganda case, the Americans seemed unable to make any useful suggestion for overcoming these circumstances. Gross said that, from his observations at Lake Success, he was convinced that the Russians would not use the Chinese situation as a pretext for pulling out of the United Nations, and we were all disposed to concur in this judgment. There was general agreement also that somehow or other the question of Chinese representation should, if possible, be solved at the latest when the next Assembly meets. The Americans did not think that they would be able to contribute materially to bringing about this solution, since they did not expect that their own position would by that time have changed. They said, however, that it was possible that, when the Assembly met, there would be so many abstentions on the question of Chinese representation that the Chinese Communists would be seated by a small majority of a small vote. They readily admitted that this somewhat crab-like manner of admitting the new Chinese Government to the United Nations would give little impression of decisiveness or leadership. However, they had no alternative proposal to offer, except for a half-hearted suggestion that they and others might withdraw their recognition from Chiang Kai-shek, and that the United Nations could then get along for a time with no Chinese representation. They realized, of course, that, even if this proposal had any other merits, it would certainly not satisfy the Russians. Jessup and his colleagues do not think that a change in Chinese representation is likely to take place on any international body before the General Assembly meets, with the possible exception of the Far Eastern Commission. The addition to the Far Eastern Commission of Ceylon and Indonesia, both of which have applied for membership, would alter the balance in that body in favour of the Chinese Communists.

5. On the subject of French Indo-China, Jessup was optimistic about the progress which was being made by Bao-Dai in the consolidation of his regime and in the extension of his authority. Jessup seemed to think highly of Bao-Dai, who, he pointed out, had struck a much harder bargain with the French than the one previously accepted by Ho Chi Minh when the latter had been head of the government. He said also that Ho Chi Minh had no capital city or administrative centre, that he made no pretence at carrying out administrative services in the areas over which his forces operated, and that the Communists in Indo-China carried on entirely as guerrillas. Jessup seemed quite sure that Ho Chi Minh was not getting much help from the Chinese Communists, and suggested that it was not even certain that the guerrilla leader was still in the country. He added that, in French Indo-China, as elsewhere in Southern Asia, there is a growing fear of the aggressive intentions of the Chinese Communists, which the latter are fostering by inflammatory and tactless propaganda. The Americans discounted the possibility that the course of their policy in French Indo-China would parallel the development which had led to such a disastrous conclusion in China. In any event, they said, they could not be any worse off if the Bao Dai regime were to collapse after they had made vigorous efforts to support it than would be the case if they withheld their support.

6. Jessup, drawing on his background as an international lawyer, developed the ingenious argument that the recognition by the United States of the Bao Dai regime in French Indo-China was based on their previous recognition of French sovereignty. Authority was devolving on Bao Dai from the French by a legal, constitutional process. It might be true that transfer of sovereignty was not yet complete, but this should not inhibit recognition. At this point Jessup tried to draw a parallel, which did not much impress us, with the gradual process by which the sovereign status of Commonwealth countries such as Canada and India had been recognized internationally.

7. In the course of the discussions about Southeast Asia I tried to draw out Jessup and Rusk concerning American defence plans for that area. I referred to Mr. Acheson's speeches in California, and particularly to those passages in which he seemed to be applying the Truman Doctrine to the southern borders of China. I asked whether or not the United States Government had in mind the development of a set of defence agreements in that area, or the establishment of something in the nature of a South Pacific alliance. They said that no precise plans were being formulated, and that all Acheson had in mind was to assure the countries of Southern Asia that, wherever they took appropriate measures either singly or collectively for their own defence, they could count on the support of the United States. I was not entirely satisfied with this explanation of Acheson's statement, and from the references which Jessup and his colleagues made then and at other times during our conversation, to American defence policy in the Pacific, I got the impression that they are thinking in terms of the possibility of developing a net-work of defence alliances in the South Pacific. They agreed that many of the governments which would be protected by such an alliance were unstable and insecure, and that it was most doubtful whether India would co-operate. They seemed, however, to have at the back of their minds the idea that even now the United States, with whatever support it could get, might underwrite some of these governments with political and military guarantees.

8. On the question of the peace treaty with Japan, Jessup said that any differences in view which had existed between General MacArthur, the Pentagon and the State Department were rapidly being resolved and he thought it would be possible to start working towards a Japanese peace treaty about the first of May. There was general agreement that an effort must be made to include the Russians in the peace treaty, and that, if they would not come, the conference must be held without them. The Americans had no very clear idea what they would do about Chinese representation at the peace conference. They suggested that it might be necessary to proceed with no Chinese representative at all. When I pointed out that a Japanese peace treaty concluded by a conference at which the Chinese Government had not been represented, or at least had the opportunity to be represented, would be hard to justify to the Chinese people, they put forward the alternative suggestion that invitations might be sent to the existing membership of the Far Eastern Commission at the time the conference was called. If a change in Chinese membership on that Commission were to take place soon, as they think possible, the opportunity would thus be given for Peiping to be represented. They did not seem to think these circumstances would be either embarrassing or anomalous, although the result would be that the United States government would be negotiating a Japanese peace settlement in a conference attended by representatives of a Chinese government which the United States refused to recognize.

9. Jessup said that, in general, the problem of a Japanese peace treaty resolved itself into two simple questions — how do you guarantee the security of smaller countries of the Pacific against Japan, and how do you guarantee the security of Japan against the mainland? He suggested that these questions might be answered by the thorough-going demilitarization of Japan, accompanied by guarantees against aggression to Japan by the signatories of the treaty, and a parallel mutual guarantee amongst the signatories against renewed Japanese aggression. He did not think there would be any particular difficulty in giving guarantees of this nature to Japan, even though similar guarantees were withheld from countries like Korea or Indonesia, because of the fact that Japan would be demilitarized. In any case, the most effective guarantee of Japanese security would be the existence on Japanese territory of American bases, which he thought the Japanese would be only too glad to give to the United States after the treaty had been signed. In this connection he pointed out that Nehru did not seem to think that any particular difficulty would arise because of American bases on Japanese territory, if these bases were established in consequence of agreements entered into by a free Japanese government after the conclusion of a treaty.

10. With reference to the economic problems of the Far East, Jessup said that at the moment civil wars were going on in almost every part of Southeast Asia and enormous resources were thereby being wasted. Once some form of political stability could be re-established, he thought rapid economic progress could be made, particularly with the technical assistance which was now being organized through the United Nations. Jessup wondered whether, as a consequence of the Spender plan, the Commonwealth would be prepared to take on responsibility for part of this technical assistance. As illustrations of what might be done, Rusk suggested that an institute on water conservation and development in Karachi, a food institute in Calcutta, and an institute on public administration in Indonesia could provide technical training of tremendous importance and, at a relatively low cost, contribute materially to the economic rehabilitation of the Far East. Jessup and Rusk hoped that at Canberra the Commonwealth countries could give consideration to a few concrete proposals of this nature, and would also try to avoid the duplication of efforts being made through other agencies, such as the F.A.O., and the technical assistance organization which would be set up as a result of their Point Four Programme.

11. We also discussed at some length the question of Kashmir. I suggested that we should now await the results of the meetings which were then taking place between Nehru and Liaquat Ali Khan in New Delhi, and said that they, themselves, might agree upon mediation procedures. The Americans expressed some alarm over the possibility that the subject of Kashmir might be withdrawn even temporarily from the Security Council. I pointed out, however, that there could be no better procedure for settlement than one upon which the two parties themselves agreed and that, in any event, the subject could be kept on the agenda of the Security Council. It was generally agreed that if the Security Council is to continue its consideration of the problem a mediator for Kashmir, under the terms of the most recent Security Council resolution, must be found as soon as possible. We went over the list of possible appointments, and I suggested a few additional names that did not seem to have occurred to the Americans.

12. We then turned to a discussion of relations between the Western Powers and the USSR. I said that I had some misgivings in regard to the present situation in which no effort was being made to reach an agreement on any subject. The public, both in America and elsewhere, was obviously disturbed by this situation, and I wondered if there were not some danger that the State Department would be pushed off the ground on which it now stands, and would in consequence be forced to renew negotiations with the USSR without adequate preparation and in circumstances which would be unfavourable. Rusk said that they were aware of this danger and were worried by it. There had, however, been some lessening in the public clamour for renewed negotiations. In any event, it was necessary to decide what object was to be gained by undertaking new negotiations. If it was hoped, by a new approach, to close the gap between ourselves and the Russians, it was not certain that public opinion would be satisfied since the negotiations would have to be private. On the other hand, if what was desired was simply a public demonstration of our willingness to settle outstanding problems on a reasonable basis, we would have to take it for granted that the Russians would continue in their present attitude and that the negotiations would fail. Failure in those circumstances might provoke a crisis even more dangerous than the present tension.

13. In spite of a persistent feeling of frustration which seems to result from the combined effect of attacks upon the State Department and the aggressive intransigence of the Russians, Jessup and Rusk seem genuinely anxious to discover some means of regaining the initiative for the United States in regard to Soviet-U.S. relations. They were not, however, very fruitful of suggestions. Rusk proposed that one or two points might be taken out of Acheson's Berkeley speech and used as a basis for discussion with the USSR, but when we questioned him further on this suggestion, he mentioned nothing more serious than negotiations about the reciprocal treatment of diplomats. In regard to atomic energy, Gross put forward a suggestion which had originated with Tsiang that talks might be renewed amongst the five sponsoring powers of the original atomic energy resolution (excluding China), and that concurrent talks could take place amongst a group of five including the present Chinese delegation but excluding the Russians. He added, however, that this proposal would not satisfy the USSR, which would almost certainly refuse to attend the talks on the ground that 450 million Chinese could not be left unrepresented in discussions of so important a topic.

14. One suggestion emerged from our discussions of atomic energy which I think deserves further consideration and may prove fruitful. We considered the possibility that a new start might be made in a meeting amongst the three powers, the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, which signed the original atomic energy declaration, and that the USSR and the French might subsequently be asked to join these talks. Since they would be informal and exploratory, and outside the framework of the machinery which had come to a standstill over the question of Chinese representation, it was possible that the USSR would agree to attend. When we raised the question whether any new element might be introduced into the atomic energy discussions in talks of this nature, we were given a very tentative indication that some members of the State Department at least might be prepared to accept something much less far-reaching than the majority plan. Rusk seemed to think that the point might soon be reached at which the deterrent effect of the atomic bomb upon the Russians would be offset by the damage the Russians could do with even a limited stockpile. In these circumstances a generally accepted prohibition against the use of atomic weapons, even if enforced by nothing more effective than the existence of retaliatory power on both sides, might have some advantage. We did not, of course, pursue this question in detail, but I was interested to find that the misgivings which have been felt concerning the insistence of the Western powers that the full majority plan for the control of atomic energy be adopted without qualification, even though it is certain that the USSR will not accept this plan, are shared by some senior officials in the State Department.

15. In general I felt a good deal of sympathy for the position of the State Department in the matter of renewed negotiations with the USSR. They are greatly harassed by irresponsible attacks on both sides from their own public. They are also being subjected to considerable pressure by people outside the United States (in the Secretariat of the United Nations, for example) to close the gap between themselves and the USSR simply by unilateral concessions. They do not see why they should be expected to give in before the intransigence of the Russians or why they should be forced to make concessions which could not be justified on their merits. While I understood their attitude in this regard, I could not, at the same time, help being disappointed that they seemed to have given up for the moment at least any attempt to consider their relations with the Russians on a broad front, and to search for some means by which a measure of confidence could be restored in world affairs. I was interested, in this connection, to find that contact with the Russians had not been entirely lost at Lake Success. Malik, the Soviet Delegate, attends social functions and even accepted invitations to dinners for Security Council members at which Tsiang was also present. He had also attended a small dinner given by Cordier, to which two senior members of the United States delegation, Gross and Ross, were also invited. Gross said there had been a lengthy and not unfriendly exchange of views at this dinner, but that no new ground had been broken.

16. We concluded our discussions by considering the agenda for the next session of the General Assembly. Jessup and his colleagues seem to think that two sets of plans should be made, taking into account either the presence or the absence of the USSR delegation. They did not think, however, that the agenda would be much affected by these circumstances, and in any case seemed to expect that the question of Chinese representation would be cleared up either before the Assembly met or immediately after it met. We agreed that the occasion might be suitable for a five-year review of the United Nations and its organizations, particularly since the Secretary-General's contract will expire, and there may be a general reorganization amongst the Assistant Secretaries-General. It was considered also that there was no alternative other than to reappoint Lie to the position of Secretary-General and it was thought that he would accept. We discussed also the question of membership in the United Nations and I suggested that we might now consider the possibility of admitting virtually all applicants on both sides, even though this might result in our accepting some fellow members whom we did not regard with much favour.

17. At the end of our discussions, Rusk remarked that the informal talks between ourselves, the United States and the United Kingdom which in previous years have taken place immediately prior to the Assembly, had proved useful. He suggested that these talks should be held again this year, and thought that they might be called at as early a date as June, in order that plans might be worked out more effectively. He also thought that consultation during the summer amongst a group including other countries might be desirable.

18. I took the opportunity of my presence in New York to ask Mr. Andrew Cordier, Executive Assistant to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and Mr. Ralph Bunche, Director in the Division of Trusteeship, to have lunch with me on Monday, April 3. Mr. Riddell and Mr. Holmes were also present on this occasion.

19. The principal subject discussed was the critical situation in the United Nations created by the problem of Chinese representation. It was clear that the Secretariat was concerned over the present crisis and anxious to explore every possibility of finding a solution. Neither Cordier nor Bunche, however, seemed to have in mind any solution in which they had confidence. They obviously hoped that a sufficient number of countries would recognize Peiping in order to alter the balance in the Security Council and the Assembly. They were far from optimistic, however, that there would be any important change in this respect before the Assembly met. They were not particularly hopeful even of decisive action by the Assembly. They pointed out that many countries were waiting for a lead from the United States, but that the United States government showed little sign of changing its policy. Cordier thought that the State Department might be prepared to see the question of the recognition and representation of China prolonged for a year or even eighteen months. He did not think, however, that the Soviet Union wished to use the Chinese problem as a pretext for withdrawal from the United Nations. He said that Malik had categorically told him, with apparent sincerity, that his country wanted to renew its participation in the United Nations.

20. Cordier touched briefly on some of the current suggestions for ending the deadlock. He referred in particular to the proposals for questioning the credentials of both Chinese representatives, but he did not seem to have much faith in this way out. With particular reference to a suggestion that the Security Council might decide to examine the credentials of all its members, he thought that this procedure could be used much more naturally in the Assembly, where the examination of credentials was a routine matter. He recognized, however, that the Assembly would probably be unable to secure a significant majority for any course of action since there would undoubtedly be many abstentions both on a proposal to reject the credentials of the Nationalist representatives and on a proposal to accept those of the Communists.

21. According to Cordier, Malik had stated quite firmly that a Soviet representative would not sit in a United Nations body on which China was not represented at all. The Soviet Government had insisted that it was iniquitous for the United Nations to proceed with its business unless the 450 million people of China were properly represented. The USSR would not, therefore, be satisfied simply with the exclusion of the representative of Nationalist China and Cordier did not think that Tsiang, who had committed himself personally to the Nationalist cause, could be persuaded to withdraw voluntarily from the struggle. Cordier was very much interested in the suggestions that the deadlock might be broken to some extent by reviving informal discussions on atomic energy outside the Security Council or the Atomic Energy Commission. He seemed to be particularly interested in the possibilities of discussions among the United States, the U.K. and Canada, in the calling of which Canada would take the initiative.

22. An interesting aspect of the discussion was that Cordier and Bunche, both of whom are United States citizens, were critical of United States policy at present vis-à-vis the Soviet Union, China and the United Nations. Their chief complaint was that it was too inflexible. They of course strongly favoured United States recognition of Peiping, and they made ironical references to the present State Department efforts to justify non-recognition because of the possibility that the new regime might prove ineffective in South China. They recognized that the State Department would be quite happy to find some formula by which the representatives of Peiping could be admitted to the United Nations and the deadlock ended without United States recognition of the Communists. They realized, however, that the United States Government was being seriously limited in developing its policy by the attacks which had been made from so many quarters on the State Department.

23. Bunche, who had just returned from Geneva, had some interesting comments on the discussions of a statute for Jerusalem in the Trusteeship Council. He said that Roger Garreau, the President of the Council, had put forward a compromise proposal immediately after the Council opened, instead of waiting for discussion to take place. As a result, his compromise had failed, and Garreau had lost interest in the subsequent proceedings. Jamali, the Iraqui delegate, had then taken control of the Council and had been able to secure his own way up to the point of attempting to have the new statute put into effect at once. The Council had refused to agree to this proposal and it had now been agreed that the redraft of the statute would be presented to Israel and Jordan for their consideration. The advantage of this procedure was that although Israel and Jordan were certain to reject it, they would have an opportunity to put forward alternatives. Instead, therefore, of having to face the Assembly with a record of complete frustration, the Council might be able to propose that the alternative suggestions of the two occupying states could form a basis for further consideration. One interesting point that Bunche made in passing was that proposals for the internationalization of Jerusalem were as embarrassing to Jordan as to Israel, since the lines of communication between Jordan and the Arab part of Palestine lay through the city. If Abdullah[12] were forced to withdraw entirely from Jerusalem, his whole position in Palestine might become untenable. Bunche also said that on the eve of the vote on the statute he had discovered that [Francis B.] Sayre, the U.S. representative, had received instructions from Washington to vote for the statute but to explain that the United States was not in favour of its being put into effect. These instructions, he said, were accompanied by a subtle legal explanation, which would not be very widely comprehended or accepted. Fortunately the instructions had been changed at the last moment, and the United States voted against the draft statute. Bunche said that he had seen Hickerson on his return and the latter had explained that he was away from the State Department when the original instructions were sent out.

24. Cordier and Bunche made a few discreet references to the future of the Secretary-General and his office. It was clear from what they said that Mr. Lie could be counted upon to reconsider his intention of retiring. Bunche thought that Mr. Lie would accept either a two, or three, or five-year renewal of his contract, as seemed most convenient. Cordier stated categorically that the Assembly, without reference to the Security Council, could prolong Lie's term if it wished. The Security Council had nominated Lie, but it was the Assembly that had fixed his term. Cordier and Bunche agreed that under present circumstances there was no alternative to the reappointment of Lie, as it was inconceivable that any suitable compromise candidate could be found. There was some discussion also about the reappointment of the Assistant Secretaries-General. Although Cordier was tactful on this subject, it was clear that he thought that the various Directors were on the whole of considerably higher calibre than the Assistant Secretaries-General and that some changes would be desirable. The contracts of all Assistant Secretaries-General would terminate with Lie's, he said, and there would be a chance for reorganization. Cordier also mentioned that Laugier[13] definitely wished to return to France.

25. Cordier said that within approximately ten months there should be available in the Manhattan headquarters a chamber for the Security Council and several other conference chambers. It should be possible, therefore, to hold all meetings except the Assembly in Manhattan from that time on. He thought that there might be some merit in holding the 1951 Assembly away from Headquarters, so that the building at Flushing could be given up after the 1950 meeting. He was interested in a suggestion that the 1951 Assembly might be held in Asia, perhaps in New Delhi, or, alternatively, that the Assembly might return to San Francisco for the fifth anniversary of the United Nations. A European or South American city, however, seemed a more likely choice.

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I went to see Mr. Hickerson yesterday in order to find out whether there had been any developments since our talks in New York with respect to the questions concerning the United Nations which we discussed with Messrs. Jessup, Rusk, and Gross.

I began by asking him particularly about the atomic discussions with the Russians. He said that consideration had been given in the State Department to the idea of the U.S., U.K., and Canada as the three original sponsors of the Assembly Resolution of 1946 undertaking a new initiative. The idea, however, has been rejected on the ground that we really have nothing new to say; it would only be worth consideration if the three governments could agree on something amounting to a fresh start in the search for international control of atomic energy. While the majority plan of the U.N. A.E.C. can doubtless be perfected in a number of ways, nevertheless the changes and additions in it which the three governments might be prepared to make would be comparatively speaking matters of detail and would not touch the central areas of disagreement with the Russians.

Mr. Hickerson also had nothing new to say about the possibility of the resumption of talks between the permanent members of the U.N. A.E.C. without Chinese participation. The general impression inside the State Department seems to be that, from the point of view of propaganda, a proposal of this nature would give the Russians a greater advantage than the other countries could extract from it. He thinks that the Russians still do not understand some of the essential elements of the majority plan, and he remarked that he is one of the few concerned with the matter in Washington who believes that they could accept it if they understood it properly without affecting any of the essential elements of their system and raising the Iron Curtain to what, from their point of view, would be a dangerous degree.

I then discussed with him the question of Chinese representation and the Russian walk-out. Here, too, there have been no developments, and he agreed that it now looks as though the settlement of the Chinese issue was further away than ever. He suggests that the Russians may be themselves disturbed by the prolongation of this issue. When they walked out in January, they probably knew that five members of the Security Council had recognized or were about to recognize the Chinese Communists and they expected the requisite seven votes to be reached in a very short period. He is quite convinced that the Russians do not want to leave the United Nations, but having taken this position, they cannot very well go back on it.

If this is the case, one thing that is puzzling is the lack of eagerness on the part of the Peiping regime to establish direct diplomatic relations with the countries which have recognized it. The way out for the Russians would be to influence the people in Peiping to get on with the job of exchanging diplomatic missions with the U.K., India, and the others and to treat with strict correctness the missions opened in Peiping. Possibly if the Russians really want to get back into U.N. bodies, there may be a change of attitude in China.

Mr. Hickerson said that they were working very hard in the State Department on plans for the next Assembly, but they were not yet ready to enter into discussions with us and other countries. He thought that their plans would become sufficiently firm probably only after the return of Mr. Acheson from the London meetings. He considers it distinctly possible that the Russian walk-out will still be in effect when the Assembly meets. This possibility would mean the development of alternative tactics on some points. Our conversation naturally led to a discussion of the general question of some new initiative in the deadlock with the Russians. He expressed the same view as Mr. Rusk — that domestic pressures for a bold move had abated markedly in the last month, and he ascribed this in large part to the effect of Mr. Acheson's speech at Berkeley. Certainly the spate of proposals which appeared in February and March have fallen off and little attention is being paid to ideas of this sort in Congress and in the press. I remarked to him that this might well be true in the United States, but that domestic pressures seemed to me to be strong in some other countries, notably in Western Europe.

This is a negative report, just as our talks in New York were on the whole negative. I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Heeney for his information.

Yours sincerely,

H.H. WRONG

SECRET Ottawa, April 22, 1950

Dear Mr. Wrong,

I am grateful for your informative letter of April 15 in which you gave me an account of your talks with Mr. Hickerson on the subjects which we discussed in New York. I am of course disappointed that the results of your enquiry were so negative, particularly in regard to the suggestion which originated with Jessup that the three original sponsoring powers might have a new look at the question of their policy on atomic energy. If, as Hickerson suggested, we are absolutely certain that we really have nothing new to say, then I do not suppose that there would be much point in the discussions which Jessup suggested. It was the hope — however illusory — that something in the way of a fresh start might come out of such consultations, that led us to believe the suggestion merited more careful consideration.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

COMMISSION INTÉRIMAIRE DE LA QUATRIÈME ASSEMBLÉE GÉNÉRALE INTERIM COMMITTEE OF THE FOURTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY

232. DEA/5475-CP-40

Le délégué permanent par intérim auprès des Nations Unies
au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Acting Permanent Delegate to United Nations to Secretary of State for External Affairs

DESPATCH 260 New York, June 8, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to the work of the Interim Committee of the United Nations Assembly. From informal discussions we have had here, it seems probable that the Interim Committee will be resuming its work about 20 June, and that it may be quite busy throughout the rest of June and July. As you know, the full

Interim Committee has not, for various reasons, held a meeting since 7 February, and the Committee is still required to take action on the following four items:

(a) Chinese charges against the Soviet Union;

(b) procedures for delimiting the boundaries of the former Italian Colonies;

(c) the question of the disposal of Eritrea;

(d) the report of the Sub-Committee on International Co-operation in the Political Field.

My impression of the situation regarding each of these four items is as follows.

CHINESE CHARGES

2. As indicated in my teletype no. 348,† there is a general reluctance on the part of the members of the Interim Committee to consider Dr. Tsiang's charges. Nevertheless, the Interim Committee is required, under the terms of the General Assembly's resolution of 8 December 1949, to report back to the Assembly on these charges "with recommendations". My understanding is that Dr. Tsiang is not pressing for a meeting at the present time. However, a meeting of the Committee will obviously have to take place on this subject before long, and it is not unlikely that the Chairman (Muniz of Brazil) will call a meeting on China in late June. The question will then arise as to whether a sub-committee should be formed to consider Dr. Tsiang's draft resolution and to prepare a draft report to the General Assembly. We have already informed several other Delegations that we are not convinced of the value of having such a sub-committee, and that, if one is formed, Canada would not wish to be a member of it. In the absence of such a sub-committee, however, there is the possibility of a general debate developing in the Interim Committee which might encourage Dr. Tsiang to take an adamant position on his draft resolution. I have already given you my opinion that there is a strong likelihood that most Delegations will abstain on Tsiang's resolution and that, while few Delegations will vote in favour of it, only a few will vote against it. Unless, therefore, some generally acceptable alternative resolution is drafted, it is quite possible that Dr. Tsiang's resolution will be adopted by the Interim Committee. This, I think, is the only thing to be said in favour of forming a sub-committee on this item. I understand that the Americans are working on a draft resolution which would seem to be calculated to exploit to the full this opportunity to score against the Soviet Union. The resolution would, of course, avoid the questions of recognition and assistance, and would concentrate on Soviet misbehaviour. It would not only concentrate on earlier violations of the Sino-Soviet Treaty, but would refer to present developments in Manchuria and the military assistance being given to the Communist Government. One thing which worries the United Kingdom Delegation is whether they still legally recognize the validity of the treaty between the Soviet Union and the Nationalist Government, in view of their recognition of Peking. It seems to me that the recent Moscow-Peking Treaty contained some kind of deliberate indication that the present treaty superseded the previous treaty, but we do not seem to have a copy of the Moscow-Peking Treaty and I have not had time to check it in a local library. If it is true that countries which have recognized Peking do not consider the previous treaty as having any validity, then it would be difficult for the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, India, and other such countries to support a United States resolution which made much of current violations.

BOUNDARIES OF FORMER ITALIAN COLONIES

3. The Interim Committee's jurisdiction in this subject is obviously a very limited one. There certainly is no suggestion that the Interim Committee should attempt to demarcate boundaries still in dispute, or make substantive recommendations for boundary adjustment to the General Assembly. The only functions within the Interim Committee's jurisdiction are to study the procedure which might be adopted for delimiting boundaries in dispute, and to make recommendations regarding such procedure to the next session of the Assembly. Therefore, it is quite possible that all the Interim Committee will do on this item is to make a general recommendation calling on the parties concerned, including the administering powers, to settle their outstanding boundary disputes through the agency of mixed boundary commissions. On this subject it might be useful to have a small sub-committee which could meet once or twice and propose some recommendation of this nature to the full Interim Committee. In view of our strong reluctance to serve on a sub-committee dealing with the Chinese question, it might be tactically desirable for us to let it be known that we are prepared to serve on a sub-committee dealing with this item if one is established.

4. The principal question involved here is, of course, finding some means of bringing Italy and Ethiopia together. The principal boundary at issue is that between Ethiopia and Italian Somaliland. I believe that the question had not been brought before the Committee earlier because there was some hope that the Italians and the Ethiopians would reach some agreement. According to the United Kingdom Delegation, however, this situation is not promising. As for the borders of Eritrea, there does not seem to be much point in making any special provisions until it is known whether that country is to be in whole or in part absorbed into Ethiopia. There is also, I think, some question of the border between the Fezzan and the neighbouring French territories. There would not seem to be much value in recommending that the French talk to themselves on this subject, and a settlement might be postponed until some kind of Libyan Government has emerged. When I was discussing this subject with Mr. Laskey of the United Kingdom Delegation the other day, he indicated that these borders would be a matter for direct negotiation among the Ethiopians, the Italians and the British, except, of course, for the Fezzan. I expressed some doubt as to whether the Assembly would recognize the right of Italy to act for Italian Somaliland, in view of the temporary and limited authority of Italy in that country. With the usual Foreign Office approach to such questions, Mr. Laskey said that discussions among the authorities in control were perfectly legal and proper, and surely there could be no objection. He seemed quite satisfied that the Italians would represent the best interest of the Somalis. I said that I did not see any objection to this kind of negotiation, but it seemed to me entirely likely that the Assembly would insist on the presence either of a third party or somebody representing United Nations interests in the Italian Colonies. If this were the case, and I agreed that it would be, as they say in the Foreign Office, "tiresome", would it not be better for some provision to be made that the decisions reached would be subject to confirmation by the Assembly? This would be one means of forestalling proposals for involving the United Nations in the actual negotiations. Mr. Laskey said that there had been suggestions that representatives of the inhabitants should be involved in the border negotiations, but he thought it would be hopeless trying to reach an agreement if the negotiators were to be plagued by, for instance, the Somali Youth League. He agreed, however, that some concession might be advisable, and thought that they could perhaps inform the Assembly of their decisions. This, he thought, would be better than submitting it to the Assembly for decision.

DISPOSAL OF ERITREA

5. Unlike the question dealing with the boundaries of the former Italian Colonies, the Interim Committee's function in the question of Eritrea is very substantial. Under the terms of the Assembly's resolution, the Commission for Eritrea (composed of representatives of Burma, Guatemala, Norway, Pakistan, and South Africa) is required to report back to the Secretary-General by not later than 15 June 1950. The Interim Committee is charged with considering this report and making its own report, "with conclusions", to the next session of the Assembly. I understand that the Eritrean Commission is badly split on the question of what recommendations it should make concerning the future of this territory. It does not seem likely that the Commission's report will reach the Secretary-General until shortly after 15 June. The indications appear to be that, in view of the time required for reproducing and circulating the report and a large number of documents, it is unlikely that this item will come before the Interim Committee until the first part of July. In view of the controversial nature of this subject and the probability that there will be no clear-cut recommendation emerging from the Commission, it is quite likely that a full-scale debate on the disposal of Eritrea will take place in the Interim Committee. It is also quite possible that a sub-committee will be formed on this subject, and we may be asked to serve on it. As soon as the report has been received from the Commission, I shall, of course, immediately send you a copy.

SUB-COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION

6. We have been told informally that it is unlikely that the report of this Sub-Committee will be available for consideration by the Interim Committee until near the end of June. The Sub-Committee has divided itself into three Working Groups, each of which is charged with considering certain paragraphs of Section B of Part II ("Settlement of Disputes and Special Political Problems by the General Assembly") of the Report submitted by the Interim Committee to the Fourth Session of the Assembly (A/966). (The work program of this Sub-Committee is contained in document A/AC.18/SC.9/1.2 of 3 February 1950.) My understanding is that the work of each of these Working Groups had been largely of a factual nature, i.e., reviewing the action already taken by the General Assembly in situations and disputes which have come before it in the past. It is quite possible, however, that the Sub-Committee may recommend certain conclusions for future action by the Assembly, although the nature of these recommendations has not yet been decided. The present indications are that each of the Working Groups will complete its work during the course of the next week, and it is expected that a draft report will then be circulated to all members of the Sub-Committee with a view to having a meeting of the full Sub-Committee on about 22 June. Therefore, it is not likely that the Sub-Committee will be ready to report to the Interim Committee much before the end of this month. Meanwhile, I hope to obtain more information during the course of the next week on the progress of work in the Sub-Committee.

7. From the above, it will be apparent that the last week of June and all of July will be an active period so far as the Interim Committee is concerned. It is also probable that this will be the period in which the Trusteeship Council will be reaching decisions which will be of importance to us in determining our position in the Fourth Committee of the next Assembly. Finally, it is quite possible that, during this period, the Security Council will be taking up again the question of the admission of new members. I believe I should draw your attention to the fact that during this period we will have only two officers in this Delegation, as Mr. Grande will be on leave until 15 July, and Mr. Carter from 15 July to mid-August. It may therefore be necessary for me to request additional help if Canada is required to serve on any of the sub-committees which may be established by the Interim Committee.

I have, etc.

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference my teletypes Nos. 394† and 397† of 22nd June, meeting of Interim Committee on Monday, 10th July at 2:30 p.m.

1. Despite the events of the past week I have heard nothing to indicate that the meeting of the Interim Committee on 10th July will be postponed. On the contrary the information available is that it will go ahead as planned. I hope, therefore, that you will be in a position to send me instructions regarding the report of the Sub-Committee on International Cooperation in the political field (my despatch No. 301 of 26th June†) in time for this meeting. This is the first item of substance on the agenda of the Committee. (Prior to consideration of this report the Committee will be required to elect a new Vice-Chairman to succeed Colonel Rahim of Pakistan, but I have not so far heard the names of any candidates for this position.)

2. After consideration of the report of the Sub-Committee on International Cooperation, the Interim Committee will take up the report of the United Nations Commission for Eritrea. I forwarded a copy of this report to you under cover of my despatch No. 312 of 29th June.† You will have noted that the Eritrean Commission of five members recommended three different solutions for Eritrea and that only two of the members were able to agree on any one of these solutions. The discussion of this item in the Interim Committee will, therefore, probably be both lengthy and contentious. I would appreciate your comments on each of the three solutions proposed in this report and your instructions as to what position I should take in the Committee. Under the Assembly's resolution of 21 November, 1949, the Interim Committee is required to consider this report of the Eritrean Commission and to "report with conclusions" to the Fifth Session of the Assembly.

3. I would also appreciate any additional comments or instructions you may wish to give me regarding the item concerning the procedures for delimiting the boundaries of the former Italian Colonies. As to the item concerning Chinese Nationalist charges against the Soviet Union, I do not know whether it is the intention of Dr. Tsiang to press these charges again at the present time, in view of the events of past ten days. This item has not at present been included on the agenda of the Interim Committee for 10th July. If, however, it is placed on the agenda again at the instance of Tsiang, I shall immediately inform you.

TELEGRAM 334 Ottawa, July 8, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Following for Holmes from LePan. Your telegram No. 445 of July 7 [sic] and previous correspondence concerning the Interim Committee.
The following comments are intended for your guidance at the forthcoming meeting of the Interim Committee on July 10.

1. Election of Vice-Chairman. As we have no indication of the candidates who are likely to contest this office, we leave it to your discretion to support the one who appears most suitable.

2. Report of the Sub-Committee on International Co-operation in the Political Field. In our view it would be advisable to postpone consideration of this report until a more auspicious occasion. A debate on this subject would sound hollow under present circumstances. In particular, any general discussion of the competence of the General Assembly would, in our opinion, be likely to do more harm than good at this time. If there is no support for postponement, we should prefer that the report be adopted without debate. If, however, the majority in the Committee favours a full discussion, you could support the adoption of the report. If a debate develops on the subject "Limits Upon the Competence of the Assembly" you should, if necessary, maintain the attitude expressed by General McNaughton in his statement before the First Committee at the second part of the third session of the Assembly.[14]

3. Report of the Commission on Eritrea. Our consideration of the Eritrean question has not reached the point where we can send you detailed comments as to the position you should adopt on the three alternative solutions proposed by the Commission. Furthermore, in view of the fact that the Interim Committee has been asked to report with its conclusions to the Assembly, Ministerial approval of the Canadian attitude will be necessary before we can authorize you to make any policy statement on this item. As we are not in a position at the moment to submit recommendations to the Minister it will be in order for you to support any motion to postpone detailed debate on the Commission's report until member governments have had further opportunity to study it.

4. Study of the Procedure to Delimit the Boundaries of the Former Italian Colonies

a) Libya. We should prefer that nothing be done about the Libyan boundaries until Libya has become an independent state. You might therefore support any proposal to defer a decision on this item until the United Nations Commissioner for Libya expresses the opinion that the time is ripe to consider it.

It is to be hoped that the French will not refer to the votes of the inhabitants of Ghadames and Ghat last spring in favour of incorporation in Tunisia and Algeria, respectively, in preference to being included in an independent Libyan state. If this issue is raised you might make a brief intervention, if necessary, drawing attention to our attitude as stated in the above paragraph.

b) Eritrea. We take the view that nothing should be done about Eritrean boundaries until a decision has been reached by the General Assembly on the disposal of the territory.

c) Somaliland. We should not wish you to take the initiative in offering suggestions for a procedure to establish the boundary between Ethiopia and Italian Somaliland, particularly since the United Kingdom has a more immediate interest in the area. We should like to be informed of any proposals that the United Kingdom and Ethiopia may make and of any suggestions that may be offered by states speaking in the interest of Italy. We should be prepared to support any reasonable proposal for a boundary commission on which Italy, Ethiopia and the United Nations Advisory Council for Italian Somaliland might be represented.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa, July 11, 1950]

ERITREA

The United Nations Commission for Eritrea submitted the report of its findings to the Secretary-General of the United Nations on June 8. From the report it would appear that the five members of the Commission were unable to agree on any one solution for the future of the territory of Eritrea. Instead the following three proposals have been submitted for consideration by the Interim Committee which convened in New York on July 10:

(a) The proposal sponsored by Burma and the Union of South Africa recommends that Eritrea be constituted at once as a self-governing unit federated with Ethiopia under the sovereignty of the Emperor of Ethiopia. Under this proposal Eritrea would enjoy local legislative and executive autonomy, while jurisdiction over defence, external affairs and fiscal matters would be exercised by the federal government.

(b) The Norwegian proposal recommends the outright incorporation of Eritrea in Ethiopia. If this is not immediately acceptable, it provides for the similar incorporation of the south-eastern part of Eritrea in Ethiopia and for the provisional exemption of the Western Province from union for such a period as may be required to give its predominantly Muslim inhabitants the opportunity of deciding if they wish to join the Eritrean-Ethiopian union or the neighbouring Sudan.

(c) The representatives of Guatemala and Pakistan advocate complete independence for Eritrea after a period of direct United Nations trusteeship for a maximum of ten years.

2. In May 1949 the Political Committee of the General Assembly adopted by a vote of 34-16-7 a draft resolution calling for the incorporation of the south-eastern half of Eritrea in Ethiopia. Canada was among those supporting this draft resolution. Although the comprehensive plan for the disposal of the former Italian colonies (the so-called Bevin-Sforza plan) was subsequently set aside in the plenary session of the General Assembly, this rejection was prompted by opposition to resumption of Italian control over Tripolitania and Italian Somaliland. There appears to have been no basic objection to the plan insofar as it applied to Eritrea. Any change in the Canadian position on the Eritrean question at this point would, therefore, have to be justified in the light of new evidence brought forward in the report of the United Nations Commission for Eritrea.

3. At the Fourth Session of the General Assembly the Canadian Delegation took the position that the Assembly did not possess sufficient information to arrive at a definitive decision on the disposal of Eritrea. Canada therefore voted in favour of the proposal to establish a Commission "to ascertain more fully the wishes and the best means of promoting the welfare of the inhabitants of Eritrea."

4. The evidence now submitted by the Commission suggests that the proposal to grant Eritrea full independence is impracticable and does not enjoy the support of any significant segment of the Eritrean people. The following factors as presented in the Report would seem to point to some form of closer association between Eritrea and Ethiopia:

(a) Eritrea alone would not be economically viable. It depends on the farming resources of the rich Ethiopian hinterland as well as on Ethiopia's transit trade.

(b) The overall security of this portion of East Africa can only be assured by the unification of the economic and defensive resources of both territories in the hands of one government.

(c) Consideration must be given to the legitimate aspirations of Ethiopia for access to the sea, both on economic and security grounds, and for the reintegration of the Eritrean people, many of whom have the most intimate bonds with the people of northern Ethiopia.

(d) The Muslim League of the Western Province having withdrawn its support from the Independence Bloc, the protagonists of an independent Eritrean State are now in a minority. On the other hand, the overwhelming mass of Christian Copts and sizeable numbers of Muslims in the highlands and the Red Sea Division favour reunion with Ethiopia.

5. In the light of these considerations I should suggest that our Acting Permanent Delegate to the United Nations be instructed to oppose the joint Guatemalan-Pakistani proposal in the Interim Committee.[15]

6. Pending a fuller study of the report of the United Nations Commission for Eritrea I think that our Acting Permanent Delegate might be asked to reserve his position on the other two proposals, though our preliminary reaction would be to favour the Norwegian solution, which takes into account the feeling in favour of partition which may exist among Muslims in the Western Province.[16]

SECRET Ottawa, July 12, 1950

I attach for your signature, if you agree, a further memorandum† for the Minister on the question of the disposal of Eritrea, discussion of which is scheduled to begin in the Interim Committee this afternoon.

2. The Minister has now approved the suggestion, contained in our previous memorandum, that Mr. Holmes be instructed to oppose from the outset the Guatemalan-Pakistani proposal to grant independence to Eritrea after a period of direct United Nations trusteeship. As to the South African-Burmese and Norwegian proposals, which recommend Eritrean federation with Ethiopia in the one case and outright reunion in the other, the Minister agreed that our Acting Permanent Delegate should reserve his position in the initial stages of the debate, though our preliminary thinking inclined toward the Norwegian solution.

3. You will note from the attached telegrams† from our Acting Permanent Delegate that there would now appear to be little likelihood of securing general acceptance for the Norwegian proposal. For tactical reasons, it will be initially supported by the United Kingdom and the United States delegations, but both delegations are convinced that they will have to swing in line behind the South African proposal for federation as the only feasible compromise solution. The United Kingdom, moreover, would be reluctant to prolong its administration of the Western Province of Eritrea for which the Norwegian proposal provided in the event that Muslim opposition should prove sufficiently strong to make the immediate inclusion of the Western Province in a union with Ethiopia inadvisable.

We have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the South African proposal has a reasonable chance of eventual adoption and that it might be advisable for a few of the more responsible delegations, including our own, to form an initial nucleus of support for this proposal.[17] This will afford the United Kingdom, the United States, and other delegations the opportunity of switching their support to the federation compromise at a suitable juncture in the discussions.[18]

1. The Interim Committee on Friday afternoon, 14th July, began with a lengthy but reasonable statement of the Ethiopian position. Berendsen of New Zealand then made an effective plea for open-mindedness and a spirit of compromise, and showed a preference for the United Kingdom solution. The Italian representative then made a statement in favour of independence. The United Kingdom thought the Italian had to some extent broken the gentleman's agreement with Ethiopia that both of them would take a mild line, but I thought that the Italian seemed moderate enough. He concluded by saying that his Government was willing to listen to other solutions. Noyes of the United States then made a statement in which he seemed to favour the Norwegian view, but in which he finally came down in favour of the Burmese-South African recommendation. I followed with a brief statement in favour of the Burmese-South African proposal (text of which I am sending today by bag),† and the Chairman then adjourned the meeting until July 24th to enable delegations to consult further with their Governments.

2. Jordaan and Stafford were very anxious that I should make a declaration in favour of federation at yesterday's meeting. I expressed some reluctance to do so unless the debate opened up into a general discussion. They persuaded me, however, that a brief Canadian statement in favour of federation would provide an effective conclusion to the day's discussion. We were all unaware that the United States were going to favour federation at this point, and if I had known that they were going to do so I should not have spoken along the same lines immediately following Noyes. From the comments made after the meeting I think, however, that the statement was useful in helping to create a movement in favour of federation.

3. Bokhari will not be back in New York until Monday and the Guatemalan has been silent. I understand that the Pakistanis and the Guatemalans, in spite of their agreement on a solution, are not on speaking terms. According to [Charles] Meade, the United Kingdom's Latin American specialist, the Guatemalan, [Carlos] Bauer, is so unpopular that those who are on his side in the argument have persuaded him not to speak. Meade is hopeful that the Latin Americans who have still not committed themselves will not support independence. At the moment the prospects for federation are promising. Menon of India told me after the meeting that his Government were thinking along the lines which I had outlined. They had not decided their position yet but he reminded me that India had at an earlier stage proposed federation. Jordaan told me that Iran and Lebanon had indicated agreement with his position and he had had a not unfavourable response from Egypt.

4. Stafford, who is acting as quarterback for all those opposed to independence, thinks the best move when the Committee reassemble would be the submission of a resolution along the lines of the Burmese-South African proposal. The South Africans are the logical sponsors but their sponsorship of any proposal concerning Africa might create unnecessary opposition. The Burmese are unlikely even to vote for a resolution in favour of federation. I suggested to Stafford that the Indians would be effective sponsors if they could be persuaded. His fear of the Indians, however, is that they would wish to draft a whole constitution for the new federation, whereas it is most important to leave the details to be worked out by the parties concerned. He asked me if Canada would propose such a resolution. I said that I thought you would be reluctant to do so in view of our comparative remoteness from Eritrea. I did not rule out, however, the possibility of our joining other countries in sponsoring such a resolution if this would be helpful. I should be grateful your instructions on this matter.

1. At the meeting of the Interim Committee yesterday afternoon, 24th July, the Italians began by making a point of the recent assassination of an Italian who had been advocating independence. Stafford had previously told me the United Kingdom authorities in Eritrea attributed this assassination directly to the intransigent statement made by the Italian representative in the Interim Committee last week.

2. The Netherlands representative expressed his preference for partition between the Sudan and Ethiopia, but said he would be willing to consider unification on a federal basis if this proposal were supported by a majority. The Australian representative, under instructions from Canberra which he did not much like, was obliged to put in a word for trusteeship for Eritrea under Ethiopia, but he was allowed to indicate that if trusteeship was not acceptable then Australia considered federation to be the best solution. The French representative ruled out independence or trusteeship, but said that he had an open mind on other solutions. The Israeli's statement was not very clear. He began by implying that the subject would have to be considered all over again in the Assembly with spokesmen from Eritrea in attendance, and therefore, that the Interim Committee could not reach a solution. The only solid reason for this view seemed to be that the Interim Committee could not dispose of the subject because its membership was more limited than that of the Assembly. However, Lourie did conclude by indicating that Israel would be happy if a compromise along the lines which had been suggested by some delegations and which would reflect the wishes of the inhabitants could be found.

3. The two spokesmen for independence were much less categorical than expected. The Guatemalan vigorously attacked the United Kingdom proposals and gave an involved discussion of the Eritrean economy which was intended to prove that Eritrea might be self-supporting. However, he ended on a far from positive note and seemed to leave the way open to other solutions. The Argentinian likewise appeared to support independence as a solution, but concluded by indicating that federation would perhaps not be a bad thing.

4. The next meeting will take place tomorrow, July 26th, presumably in the afternoon although time was not stated. Bokhari did not turn up at the meeting although he has returned to this country. His Deputy indicated that he would prefer to put off the Pakistan statement until Wednesday. Only one or two other speakers are on the list for Wednesday, and a suggestion was made that the Chairman should at that time announce the time for the closing of the discussion. There is general realization that we can not continue this debate indefinitely and that some positive proposals must be put forward. The reluctance of a majority of delegations to state their views, and the inconclusive nature of the statements yesterday are attributable to the general realization that negotiations of some kind are going on and the widespread hope that a compromise will be put forward which a majority could accept. Almost every speaker yesterday emphasized the necessity of finding a solution without delay.

5. The time does seem ripe for a resolution along the lines of federation. Jordaan told me that he had been instructed to go ahead with a resolution provided he had the co-sponsorship of Burma. The Burmese, however, still have no instructions, and it is unlikely that they will receive any. Jordaan, therefore, has asked his Government if he might sponsor a resolution in association with other countries. He endeavoured to secure the support of Muniz of Brazil. Muniz said that he himself thought that only a middle of the road solution would carry the day. He was worried, however, about the proposals for federation which he had been told (presumably by the Italians) were merely a camouflage for incorporation. Muniz indicated that this argument was being sold to the other Latin Americans and thought that it would be helpful if Jordaan could make it clear that this was not the case. Jordaan had a long talk with the Ethiopians yesterday, who, he said, are not giving much ground. They were prepared to consider only local autonomy for Eritrea as a province of Ethiopia.

6. Noyes, Stafford and Jordaan have all discussed with me the possibility of our taking some initiative in a resolution. I have been encouraging them to round up supporters for a resolution, and told them that if a reasonable resolution is drafted and other respectable countries are prepared to support it, I would recommend to you that we might be a co-sponsor. Noyes is seeing Padilla and Muniz today and hopes to persuade them to join in sponsorship.

7. Although the disposition towards compromise along federal lines is strong and widespread, I fear that we are reaching the difficult stage in which it will be necessary to be specific. A real federation as we understand it is impractical for this primitive country, and would be opposed by the United Kingdom and United States. Autonomy within Ethiopia, Northern Ireland-style, is most likely to appeal to supporters of incorporation and of federation. It is questionable whether this should be called federation, but if we wish to support it we had better continue at least to call it "a solution along federal lines". It is this kind of solution, however, which the supporters of independence can most easily call "camouflaged incorporation". If we are going to sell this solution to the Eritrean minorities as well as to the Latin Americans and Italians the danger is that we shall be drawn into stipulating guarantees and in fact defining the new constitution. When I raised this question of the danger of the United Nations guarantee with Stafford, Noyes and Jordaan, they insisted that we must leave the Eritreans and Ethiopians to work out a constitution themselves. This is all very well, but I don't see how we can win over the supporters of independence, unless we offer the Eritreans guarantees before they begin negotiating with the Ethiopians.

ERITREA

1. The principal feature of Wednesday afternoon's session of the Interim Committee was a long statement by Bokhari of Pakistan. It was a clever and effective statement of the case for independence. The arguments were those contained in the Pakistan-Guatemala section of the Commission's report. Bokhari defended the establishment of a trusteeship and an independent regime not necessarily as a final state. He admitted that the people of Eritrea might wish union with Ethiopia but said that the only way to give them a fair chance to decide on their own future was first of all to give them their own Government. This has been virtually the only intransigent statement yet made. Even Saudi Arabia, which along with Yemen yesterday favoured independence for Eritrea, admitted the possibility of some regional arrangement between Eritrea and Ethiopia — by which was presumably meant a loose constitutional association. The Cuban representative also spoke in favour of independence after a period of trusteeship, but like the Argentinian said he was ready to consider any other proposal coming out of the current efforts at conciliation.

2. Statements in favour of the union of Eritrea and Ethiopia were made by representatives of Egypt, China, and Liberia. The Greek made a confused statement which I interpreted as favouring a federal solution.

3. The most encouraging event was the statement by the Bolivian representative. After proclaiming the devotion of all Latin Americans to the principle of independence he said that Latin Americans nevertheless must not call for independence when independence is not viable. If a formula could be found for a federation giving Eritrea the necessary independence under the Ethiopian Crown, he would support a federation as a compromise solution. There were implications in the Bolivian speech that he was speaking for his Latin American colleagues as well. I asked the Chilean representative after the meeting if this was the case. She said that the Bolivian was speaking in accordance with the instructions of his own Government, but she admitted nevertheless his approach to the question was shared by other Latin American countries. She herself would adopt a similar attitude in a statement at the next meeting. She emphasized that the Latin Americans would be prepared to accept a federal solution provided Eritrea has genuine autonomy and the federation was not just a camouflage for incorporation.

4. Those hoping for a solution along federal lines are more optimistic in view of the evidence that the Latin Americans are in a reasonable frame of mind and do not intend to insist on independence at all costs. Stafford and Noyes told me that Muniz or Padilla [Nervo] would possibly be approaching me to see whether there was a possible common approach on the part of those countries which had spoken in favour of federation. Without closing the door on the possibility of our being co-sponsors of an acceptable resolution, I have resisted suggestions that we should take any initiative. The argument, however, that we do not wish to take an initiative because we are not directly concerned is not very effective in practice, because the endeavour at the moment is to keep in the background all those countries who have direct interest, and to put forward a compromise solution in the names of the remoter countries of Europe and the Americas which are assumed to be objective, and whose sponsorship would not provoke opposition.

5. My immediately following teletype contains the text of a draft resolution which Stafford and Noyes have been showing to a few interested delegations. They have asked me to treat it with great discretion and emphasize that it is still in rough form.

6. Muniz said that the list of speakers in the debate would be closed last evening, and the next meeting on the subject of Eritrea would take place Monday afternoon.

ERITREA

Re my immediately preceding teletype No. 530, following is text of draft resolution: Text begins:

The interim Committee,

HAVING CONSIDERED the report of the United Nations Commission for Eritrea,

RECOMMENDS to the General Assembly that it approve the following resolution:

WHEREAS by paragraph 3 of Annex XI to the Treaty of Peace with Italy, 1947, the Powers concerned have agreed to accept the recommendation of the General Assembly on the disposal of the former Italian colonies in Africa and to take appropriate measures for giving effect to it; and

WHEREAS by paragraph 2 of the aforesaid Annex XI such disposal is to be made in the light of the wishes and welfare of the inhabitants and the interests of peace and security, taking into consideration the views of interested Governments;

NOW THEREFORE

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, in the light of the report of the United Nations Commission for Eritrea and the recommendations of the Interim Committee, and

TAKING INTO CONSIDERATION

(a) The wishes and welfare of the inhabitants of Eritrea, including the views of the various racial, religious and political groups of the provinces of the territory and the capacity of the people for self-government;

(b) The interests of peace and security in East Africa;

(c) The rights and claims of Ethiopia based on geographical, historical, ethnic or economic reasons, including in particular Ethiopia's legitimate need for adequate access to the sea;

BELIEVING that the disposal of Eritrea should be based on its close political and economic association with Ethiopia; and

DESIRING that this association assure to the inhabitants of Eritrea the fullest respect and safeguards for their institutions, traditions, religions and languages, as well as the widest possible measure of local self-Government, while at the same time assuring to the Empire of Ethiopia the maintenance of its constitution, institutions, traditions, and its international status and identity;

RECOMMENDS THAT:

1. Eritrea and Ethiopia shall be federated under the sovereignty of the Ethiopian Crown.

2. Eritrea shall be self-governing and shall possess local legislative and executive autonomy, and the right of Eritreans to manage their own affairs shall be protected.

3. Full authority shall be vested in the Federal Government with regard to such matters as defence and national security, external affairs, finance and currency, foreign and interstate commerce, and communications. Eritrea shall pay its proportionate share of the expenses of the Federal Government in carrying out the functions set forth above.

4. The area of the federation shall constitute a single area for customs purposes and there shall be no barriers to the free movement of goods and persons within the area.

5. A single nationality shall prevail throughout the federation.

6. No discrimination shall be practiced in Eritrea as regards the religious, personal and civic rights of the indigenous inhabitants. Basic human rights and fundamental freedoms for all inhabitants of Eritrea, including minorities, shall be guaranteed. All property rights shall be fully respected.

7. There shall be a United Nations Commissioner in Eritrea appointed by the General Assembly.

8. The Commissioner shall consult with the Government of Ethiopia, and advise and assist a representative Assembly of Eritreans for the purpose of formulating a constitution giving effect to the provisions of paragraphs 1 through 6 above.

9. The constitution shall go into effect as soon as it shall have been approved by the Commissioner, adopted by the Eritrean Assembly, and ratified by the Government of Ethiopia as an annex to its constitution. Every effort shall be made to bring it into effect as soon as possible, and, in any event, before the end of 1951.

10. The present administration shall continue to conduct the current affairs of Eritrea until the constitution is put into effect. During this transition period the administration shall, as rapidly as possible, induct Eritreans into all levels of the administration, form a Representative Assembly of Eritreans, and assist the Eritrean Assembly in formulating its views on the constitution. During the transition period the administration may, on behalf of the Eritreans, negotiate a customs union with Ethiopia to be put into effect as soon as practicable.

11. Arrangements shall be made by the Government of the United Kingdom as the present Administering Authority for the transfer of power to the appropriate authorities. The transfer of power shall take place as soon as the constitution comes into effect in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 9 above.

12. The Commissioner shall reside within Eritrea until the transfer of authority has been completed and shall make appropriate reports to the Secretary-General of the United Nations concerning the discharge of his functions. When the transfer of authority has been completed, he shall so certify to the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE

Your teletype No. 531 of July 27. Eritrea.

We have studied the text of the draft resolution on the disposal of Eritrea shown you in confidence by Stafford and Noyes and are inclined to feel that it marks a considerable step forward. Although based on the recommendations of the South African and Burmese members of the Eritrean Commission, the new text differs from the former proposals in certain important respects. The changes should make it easier for us to support the draft resolution, since the new text seems to come somewhat closer to being a genuine proposal for federation. Its sponsors, we believe, should be able honestly to refute any possible charges that they are attempting to facilitate the annexation of Eritrea by Ethiopia under a pretended form of federation.

2. One of the first features which merits special attention is the final clause of the preamble, which assures to Ethiopia the maintenance of its constitution and institutions. This means that association with Eritrea need not upset the important measures of reform in provincial administration which the Emperor has introduced since 1941. One of the objections to the earlier Burmese-South African proposal was that it might have had the undesirable effect of forcing the Emperor to reorganize the internal administration of Ethiopia to correspond with the plan for two self-governing units, each possessing legislative and executive autonomy, which were to have functioned along with a third, federal authority.

3. In consonance with this clause of the preamble, Article 2 of the proposed resolution is so framed as to suggest that it is not the intention to force Ethiopia to alter the form of its internal administration. The article does not provide, as did the Burmese-South African recommendation, that "each member" of the proposed federation should have "local legislative and executive autonomy", full authority in certain specified matters being vested in the federal government. Instead the new text states merely that Eritrea shall have local legislative and executive autonomy. Ethiopia is not mentioned. By implication, therefore, the form of the Ethiopian government is to be left untouched.

4. It may be easier to visualize the status proposed for Eritrea if the contrast with the actual status of the provinces of Ethiopia is pointed out. In Ethiopia, for the first time in history, the Emperor has recently done away with the autocratic rights of the rases, or military chiefs, and has substituted direct control by the central administration under the Ministry of the Interior. Formerly, the rases had a free hand in collecting what taxes they pleased and in maintaining personal armies. The welfare of each province thus depended primarily on the character of the individual ras. Since 1942, however, governors-general appointed by the Emperor to each of the twelve provinces have been required to conduct public business through the intermediary of officials appointed from Addis Ababa. All salaries of provincial officials are paid out of the national treasury, as are the salaries of mayors of municipalities. Only taxes authorized by the central government may be collected by provincial officials and full reports must be sent to the Emperor's Minister of Finance. Care has been exercised in the choice of provincial representatives of the Ministry of Finance, who are said to be instituting a revolution in traditional methods of tax collection. So far as he can, the Emperor is training up in the provinces a body of administrators in other departments also, who are expected to diffuse through the country a new concept of the functions and responsibilities of government officials. The police force is also organized and trained by the central government. Today, therefore, the Ethiopian provinces no longer enjoy executive autonomy. Neither do they possess any legislative organs. To endow Eritrea with executive and legislative autonomy under the proposed constitution means that the territory will have an identity separate from that of Ethiopia on the basis of which a genuine federal relationship can be established.

5. Passing to Article 3 of the draft resolution, we note that the Burmese-South African proposal for federal control of the whole field of taxation has been discarded. This is obviously to the advantage of Eritrea, since the monopoly of taxation in the whole federal area by the central government at Addis Ababa might have made it possible for Ethiopia to impose its will on Eritrea regardless of the provisions of Article 2. We interpret this to mean that Eritrea would collect in its own territory customs dues, land taxes, property taxes and taxes on special items such as petrol and alcohol, court fees, mining fees and other territorial revenue and that the proportion of revenues it would turn over to the central government at Addis Ababa would be based on an agreement which would have to be a vital part of the proposal for federation.

6. It seems to us that the proposed draft goes as far as necessary in laying down general principles on which the constitution should be based, and that in the interests of securing a stable settlement further details should be left to the principals to work out themselves. You are therefore authorized to give it your support, although we are still not able to approve your co-sponsoring the Resolution. We should be willing to consider, of course, any suggestions which may be made later for its modification.

7. We are somewhat concerned by your report that the Emperor still insists that Eritrea should have merely the status of an Ethiopian province. We should be interested to know whether Stafford believes the Emperor will abandon this position if a majority in the Interim Committee votes in favour of the draft resolution as it now stands.

8. My next succeeding telegram† contains informal comments on the present administration of Ethiopia which may be of use to you in visualizing the practical effects for Eritrea of its proposed association with the government at Addis Ababa.

ERITREA

Referring to my immediately preceding teletype†, the following is the text of the draft resolution presented by Muniz at this morning's meeting. Text Begins:

The Interim Committee,

Having considered the report of the United Nations Commission for Eritrea.

Recommends to the General Assembly that it approve the following resolution:

Whereas by paragraph 3 of Annex XI to the Treaty of Peace with Italy, 1947, the Powers concerned have agreed to accept the recommendation of the General Assembly on the disposal of the former Italian colonies in Africa and to take appropriate measures for giving effect to it; and

Whereas by paragraph 2 of the aforesaid Annex XI such disposal is to be made in the light of the wishes and welfare of the inhabitants and the interests of peace and security, taking into consideration the views of interested Governments;

Now therefore

The General Assembly, in the light of the report of the United Nations Commission for Eritrea and the recommendations of the Interim Committee, and

Taking into consideration

(a) The wishes and welfare of the inhabitants of Eritrea, including the views of the various racial, religious and political groups of the provinces of the territory and the capacity of the people for self-government;

(b) The interests of peace and security in East Africa;

(c) The rights and claims of Ethiopia based on geographical, historical, ethnic or economic reasons, including in particular Ethiopia's legitimate need for adequate access to the sea;

Taking into account the importance of assuring the continuing collaboration of the foreign communities in the economic development of Eritrea;

Recognizing that the disposal of Eritrea should be based on its close political and economic association with Ethiopia; and

Desiring that this association assure to the inhabitants of Eritrea the fullest respect and safeguards for their institutions, traditions, religions and languages, as well as the widest possible measure of local self-government, while at the same time assuring to the empire of Ethiopia the maintenance of its constitution, institutions, traditions, and its international status and identity;

a. Recommends that:

1. Eritrea shall constitute an autonomous unit federated with Ethiopia under the sovereignty of the Ethiopian Crown.

2. The Eritrean Government shall possess legislative, executive and judicial powers in the field of domestic affairs.

3. The jurisdiction of the Federal Government shall extend to the following matters: defense, foreign affairs, currency and finance, foreign and inter-state commerce and external and inter-state communications including ports. The Federal Government shall have the power to maintain the integrity and internal security and good order of the federation, and shall have the right to levy uniform taxes throughout the federation to meet the expenses of federal functions and services, provided that Eritrea shall bear only its just and equitable share of these expenses. The jurisdiction of the Eritrean Government shall extend to all matters not vested in the Federal Government, including the power to maintain internal police, to levy taxes to meet the expense of domestic functions and services, and to adopt its own budget.

4. The area of the federation shall constitute a single area for customs purposes and there shall be no barriers to the free movement of goods and persons within the area. Customs duties on goods entering or leaving the federation which have their final destination or origin in Eritrea shall be assigned to Eritrea.

5. An Imperial Federal Council, composed of equal numbers of Ethiopian and Eritrean representatives shall meet at least once a year and shall advise upon the common affairs of the federation referred to in Article 3.

6. A single nationality shall prevail throughout the federation. All inhabitants of Eritrea except persons possessing foreign nationality shall be nationals of the federation. The qualifications for exercising their rights as citizens of Eritrea shall be determined by the constitution and laws of Eritrea. All persons possessing foreign nationality who have resided in Eritrea for ten years prior to the date of the adoption of this resolution shall have the right, without further requirements of residence, to apply for the nationality of the federation in accordance with federal laws. Such persons who do not thus acquire the nationality of the federation shall be permitted to reside in and engage in peaceful and lawful pursuits in Eritrea. The rights and interests of foreign nationals resident in Eritrea shall be guaranteed in accordance with the provisions of Article 7.

7. All residents of Eritrea without distinction of nationality, race, sex, language or religion, shall enjoy human rights and fundamental liberties, including the following:

(a) The right of equality before the law. No discrimination shall be made against foreign enterprises in existence in Eritrea, engaged in industrial, commercial, agricultural, artisan, educational or charitable activities, nor against banking institutions and insurance companies operating in Eritrea.

(b) The right to life, liberty and security of person.

(c) The right to own and dispose of property. No one shall be deprived of property including contractual rights, without due process of law and without payment of just and effective compensation.

(d) The right to freedom of opinion and expression and of adopting and practicing any creed or religion.

(e) The right of education.

(f) The right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association.

(g) The right to inviolability of correspondence and domicile, subject to requirements of the law.

(h) The right to exercise any profession subject to the requirements of the law.

(i) No one shall be subject to arrest or detention without an order of a competent authority, except in case of flagrant and serious violation of the law in force. No one shall be deported except in accordance with the law.

(j) The right to a fair and equitable trial.

(k) Retroactivity of penal law shall be excluded.

The respect for the rights and freedoms of others and the requirements of public order and the general welfare alone will justify any limitations to the above rights.

8. Paragraphs 1 through 7 of this resolution shall constitute the Federal Act.

9. There shall be a transition period not exceeding _____ during which the Eritrean Government will be organized and the Eritrean Constitution prepared and put into effect.

10. There shall be a United Nations Commissioner in Eritrea appointed by the General Assembly.

11. During the transition period, the present administering authority shall continue to conduct the affairs of Eritrea. It shall, in consultation with the United Nations Commissioner, prepare as rapidly as possible the organization of an Eritrean administration, induct Eritreans into all levels of the administration, and make arrangements for and convoke a Representative Assembly of Eritreans chosen by the people. It may, in agreement with the Commissioner negotiate on behalf of the Eritreans a temporary customs union with Ethiopia to be put into effect as soon as practicable.

12. The United Nations Commissioner shall, in consultation with the administering authority, the Government of Ethiopia, and representatives of the people of Eritrea, prepare a draft of the Eritrean constitution to be submitted to the Eritrean Assembly and shall advise and assist the Eritrean Assembly in its consideration of the Constitution. The Constitution of Eritrea shall also be based on the principles of democratic Government, shall be consistent with the provisions of the Federal Act and shall include the guarantees contained in its Article 7.

13. The Federal Act and the Eritrean Constitution shall enter into effect simultaneously following ratification of the Federal Act by the Emperor of Ethiopia and the Eritrean Assembly, and following approval by the Commissioner, adoption by the Eritrean Assembly and ratification by the Emperor of Ethiopia of the Eritrean Constitution.

14. Arrangements shall be made by the Government of the United Kingdom as the administering authority for the transfer of power to the appropriate authorities. The transfer of power shall take place as soon as the constitution comes into effect in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 13 above.

15. The Commissioner shall maintain his headquarters in Eritrea until the transfer of power has been completed, and shall make appropriate reports to the General Assembly of the United Nations concerning the discharge of his functions. The Commissioner may consult with the Interim Committee of the General Assembly with respect to the discharge of his functions in the light of developments and within the terms of the present resolution. When the transfer of authority has been completed, he shall so report to the General Assembly and submit to it the text of the Eritrean constitution.

b. Authorizes the Secretary-General, in accordance with established practice:

1. To arrange for the payment of an appropriate remuneration to the United Nations Commissioner;

2. To assign to the United Nations Commissioner such expert staff and to provide such facilities as the Secretary-General may consider necessary to carry out the terms of the present resolution. Text ends.

Your teletypes No. 604 of August 25, No. 615† of August 29 and No. 621† of September 1, Eritrea.

1. We have analysed the new draft resolution for Eritrea, comparing it clause by clause with the draft circulated in July by Stafford and Noyes. We consider the new draft to be an improvement in several respects. It has introduced new safeguards of the interests of Eritrea, Ethiopia and Italy and has made clearer the functions of the present administration and of the United Nations Commissioner during the transition period so as to facilitate their mutual cooperation.

2. Moreover, instead of attempting to embody in a constitution for Eritrea principles which would govern the federal administration, the new draft makes provision for two separate instruments, (a) a federal act providing guarantees considered essential by the United Nations Assembly, which would be ratified both by the Emperor of Ethiopia and by the Eritrean Assembly, and (b) a constitution for Eritrea, which would be drafted by the United Nations Commissioner in consultation with those directly concerned, adopted by the Eritrean Assembly and ratified by the Emperor. This disposes of a number of legal difficulties.

3. The concessions made to Italy in clause 5 of the preamble and in Articles 6 and 7 provide only normal guarantees of the rights of foreigners and are therefore not objectionable. We miss one feature, however, that is customary in basic laws relating to African territory. Neither clause (a) nor clause (c) of Article 7 makes it mandatory to secure the approval of duly constituted authority before land transfers are made to foreigners. We should be interested to know the reason for this omission.

4. In the new draft, we find an increased precision in the definition of Eritrea's position as an autonomous unit federated with Ethiopia. It seems appropriate that Eritrea should possess judicial as well as legislative and executive powers in the domestic sphere, that it should enjoy the right to levy taxes in order to maintain its own services and that it should keep for its own use export and import duties on goods originating or consumed in Eritrea. We do not clearly understand, however, the respective functions of the federal and Eritrean authorities in relation to internal security (Article 3). Federal armed forces are to be used "to maintain the ... internal security and good order of the federation", while Eritrea will have "the power to maintain internal police". Since it is not always easy to distinguish between banditry and political unrest in Eritrea, we wonder whether this article is sufficiently clear. We have a feeling that this is the sort of question which should properly be left to the Eritreans to work out in consultation with the Ethiopians with the aid of the United Nations Commissioner. We do not suggest that the General Assembly should itself go into the question in greater detail, but we recognize that until the division of functions has been more clearly defined, a certain anomaly may be said to exist in this paragraph of the proposed Federal Act.

5. Since a situation appears to have developed in which it has become important for so-called neutral states to use their influence to encourage Italy and Ethiopia to accept a compromise arrangement with good grace, you are authorized to allow Canada to appear as co-sponsor of a resolution along the lines of the draft contained in your teletype No. 604 of August 25, provided there are 4 or 5 other satisfactory sponsors and provided a substantial majority of the members seem likely to join in supporting the measure. We cannot expect any resolution adopted by the Assembly to be accepted in Eritrea itself without some violence, but I think the proposed measure is likely to encounter less opposition than any other which the Assembly would accept.

1. I have just been informed that the Interim Committee will be meeting this afternoon (15th September) at 3:00 p.m. The agenda will include the three remaining items: (a) Eritrea, (b) Nationalist Chinese charges against the Soviet Union, (c) procedure for delimiting the boundaries of the former Italian colonies. In regard to these three items I have received the following information informally from the Secretariat.

2. Eritrea — apparently the discussions between Muniz, the Chairman of the Interim Committee, and Count Sforza have not led to agreement and I understand it is Muniz' intention to report to the Interim Committee that, although informal negotiations on a draft resolution have taken place, these negotiations have not been successful. My understanding is that, accordingly, Muniz will propose to the Interim Committee that a resolution should be adopted informing the General Assembly that the Committee has not been able to make a proposal regarding Eritrea, and that the General Assembly must itself consider the question (see paragraph 3 (c) of my teletype No. 663.†)

3. Chinese charges against the Soviet Union — my understanding is that it is Muniz' intention to suggest to the Interim Committee that a frank report be made to the Assembly stating that, in view of the fact that these Nationalist Chinese charges are a part of the general political problem of China which will, in any case, be discussed by the General Assembly, the Interim Committee believes that this matter must also be referred back to the Assembly. I understand that Muniz has discussed this matter with Dr. Tsiang but I have no information as to whether or not Tsiang has agreed to defer a debate on this question.

4. Procedure for delimiting the boundaries of the former Italian colonies — the United States delegation have today submitted a resolution along the lines described in my teletype No. 664.† The text of this resolution is contained in my immediately following teletype.† Unless I hear from you to the contrary, I propose to vote in favour of this resolution at the meeting of the Interim Committee this afternoon. If you wish me to adopt a different position I would appreciate receiving your immediate instructions.

Memorandum by United Nations Division to Head, United Nations Division

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], September 18, 1950

On receipt of the two attached teletypes Nos. 680 and 681† of September 15 from New York I discussed the relevant paragraphs with Miss MacCallum, Mr. Menzies and Mr. Campbell, and asked them to let me have any comments which they would like transmitted by telephone to Mr. Riddell.

2. Miss MacCallum thought there would be no objection to Mr. Riddell's supporting the draft resolution proposed by the United States on the delimitation of the boundaries of the former Italian colonies (teletype No. 681).

3. On the question of Chinese charges against the Soviet Union, Mr. Menzies and Mr. Campbell pointed out that it would be dangerous for the Interim Committee, in handing back this item to the General Assembly, to make deliberate reference to the Nationalist Chinese charges as "part of the general political problem of China" (paragraph 3 of teletype No. 680). It was by no means certain how the broad problem of China would be approached at the Assembly, but it would be highly unfortunate if the Interim Committee's resolution concerning the Chinese charges were to draw attention to that aspect of the China problem in such a way as to enable mischief-makers to complicate any discussions the Assembly might have on Korea or Formosa. Mr. Menzies thought that if it were tactically possible Mr. Muniz should content himself with a factual report from the Interim Committee to the General Assembly to the effect that the Interim Committee had made no progress in dealing with this item and was therefore referring it back to the Assembly.

4. Mr. Reid agreed with the opinions expressed by Mr. Menzies and Mr. Campbell with regard to the Chinese item, and also agreed that Canada might support the United States draft resolution on the delimitation of the frontiers of the former Italian colonies. This information was therefore conveyed at about 3.00 p.m. yesterday, by telephone, to Mr. Riddell, who thought that it would be possible to arrange for an innocuous means of reporting the Interim Committee's failure to deal with the Chinese charges. No draft resolution on this subject had, however, been circulated at that time.

Reference previous correspondence — Interim Committee.

1. At its meeting at 3.00 p.m., 15th September, the Interim Committee disposed of its three remaining items by referring them back to the General Assembly without discussing the substance of any of the three questions.

2. So far as Eritrea was concerned, the chairman, Muniz of Brazil, referred to the informal consultations which had taken place, on the initiative of the United Kingdom and United States representatives, Padilla Nervo of Mexico and himself, in order to draft "a carefully balanced formula capable of meeting the widely divergent views" expressed regarding this question. Muniz said that he regretted the Interim Committee would not have sufficient time to consider the results of these informal negotiations, and added that the compromise formula worked out should afford a useful basis for discussion in the General Assembly, if any delegation wished to bring it forward. Muniz then said that the best course for the Interim Committee to adopt would be to incorporate his statement into the rapporteur's report and to refer the matter back to the Assembly without further discussion. Muniz declined to accept a proposal of the Greek representative that the draft resolution developed by the negotiators should be included as an annex to the report. He said that there was no definite text of a draft resolution, only a set of principles, and that it would be incorrect to include this statement of principles as an annex to the Interim Committee's report in view of the fact that the Committee had not had time to discuss them. Without further discussion the Committee agreed to accept Muniz's suggestion.

3. So far as China was concerned, Muniz also stated that, in view of the lack of time, and in view of the fact that this "touched on" a number of questions which were already on the Assembly's agenda, there would be little purpose on holding a debate at this late stage in the Interim Committee. He therefore proposed that the Committee should instruct the rapporteur to report to the Assembly that the Committee had decided not to discuss the substance of this question. For China Dr. Tsiang said that it was "physically necessary" for him to accept the chairman's proposal, but that he wished to "register deep disappointment" at the lack of progress made by the Interim Committee on this item. In answer to a question from me for clarification Muniz stated that it was not his intention that the rapporteur's report should recommend to the Assembly that this item be considered in connection with other items on the Assembly's agenda, and he emphasized that this question would be a separate item on the agenda of the Assembly. The Committee adopted this proposal of Muniz without further discussion.

4. So far as the delimitation of boundaries of the former Italian Colonies was concerned, the United States representative (Noyes) stressed that his delegation's resolution had been prepared as a working paper and was not meant to be a final text. The chairman then proposed that the last paragraph of the draft resolution, which referred to the boundaries of Ethiopia, might be deleted in view of the fact that "some delegations" considered these boundaries to be connected with the question of Eritrea, on which no decision had been taken. Noyes agreed to delete the paragraph. In reply to a question from me Noyes said that the "third person" referred to several times in the text of the resolution was meant to be an "uninstructed individual" as opposed to a commission or a national representative. He also agreed to delete the word "third" as being unnecessary and somewhat misleading. A somewhat confused procedural discussion then developed in which many delegations emphasized that they had not had time to study the United States draft resolution. Two proposals were submitted. The first one was by Ecuador to have the Interim Committee submit this draft resolution "for the consideration of the General Assembly" instead of "recommending" it to the Assembly. The other proposal was by the Lebanese representative to merely annex the United States draft resolution to the rapporteur's report, stating that the Interim Committee had not had sufficient time to consider it. I expressed support for the Ecuadorean proposal, which implied some support by the Interim Committee of the United States draft resolution, and said that my instructions would authorize me to support the United States draft. However, the Lebanese proposal was put to the vote first and adopted by a vote of 21 in favour, 5 against, and 17 abstentions (including Canada). The United States draft resolution will thus be annexed to the report of the Interim Committee without any recommendation.

5. This concluded the work of the Interim Committee, and it will meet again on Monday morning at 11.00 a.m. for the purpose of approving its reports. As all these three reports will be without any real substance, the meeting on Monday will presumably be very short.

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE UNITED NATIONS ASSEMBLY

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the meeting of the United Nations Assembly, due to begin in about a month, was of considerable importance and might be a turning point in the development of that organization. It was proposed that the delegation should be a Parliamentary one with officials as alternates and that four members of Opposition parties be appointed as Parliamentary advisers. Certain specific recommendations were made for appointments to the delegation.

8. The Cabinet, after discussion:

(a) approved the following composition of the Canadian delegation to the forthcoming meeting of the United Nations Assembly:

Chairman — the Honourable L.B. Pearson, Secretary of State for External Affairs
Vice-Chairman — the Honourable Hugues Lapointe, Minister of Veterans Affairs
Senator J.G. Turgeon
Jean Lesage, Esquire, M.P.
John Dickey, Esquire, M.P.
Alternates — A.D.P. Heeney, Esquire, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
Léon Mayrand, Esquire, Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
R.G. Riddell, Esquire, Permanent Delegate [sic] to the United Nations
Fraser Elliott, Esquire
Mrs. D.B. Sinclair, Executive Assistant to the Deputy Minister of Welfare (subject to suitable arrangements for her participation being made between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Health and Welfare)

(b) approved in principle the inclusion of four Parliamentary advisers in the delegation; specific appointments to be considered at a later date.[20]

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 215-50[21] [Ottawa], September 8, 1950

The fifth session of the General Assembly comes at a critical stage in the history of the United Nations. While the prompt action of the Security Council in the Korean crisis, and the approval of that action by the great majority of member states, have substantially restored the prestige of the United Nations, unmistakable signs exist that the organization, as at present constituted, does not provide a firm guarantee against possible future aggression. Had the Soviet representative attended the Security Council meetings of June and July, he could have prevented effective United Nations action to repel the North Korean aggression. Now that the U.S.S.R. has reversed its policy of boycotting the Security Council, the Soviet representative has demonstrated that the Council will not be permitted to carry out effectively its primary function of maintaining peace and security. If this situation continues, it is essential that other means be found to erect a reliable structure of collective security within the framework of the United Nations.

2. To give new strength to the United Nations, a formula must be devised which, while making the organization an effective guarantor of peace, will not cause the Soviet Union to withdraw. The danger of Soviet withdrawal exists because the strength of the Soviet position in the organization is derived almost entirely from its status as a permanent member of the Security Council where its concurring vote is required before decisions of substance can be taken. Any action to relieve the Council of its functions as the primary instrument for the maintenance of peace will be taken by the U.S.S.R. for what in fact it is — an expedient for getting around the problem of the veto — and will encounter bitter Soviet opposition. The schism between the Cominform states and the free world in the United Nations is already dangerously wide; it should not be allowed to degenerate into a rupture of diplomatic relations brought about by the withdrawal of the Soviet Union from the United Nations. It is equally important that the U.S.S.R. should not be presented with an opportunity to claim that precipitate action by the non-Communist world had forced such a withdrawal.

3. The principal means of strengthening the United Nations now under consideration in this respect, are:

(a) Possible amendments to the General Assembly's rules of procedure to enable that body to meet on short notice to deal with security questions if the Security Council has been unable to carry out its functions;

(b) Establishment of a United Nations Commission to make rapid, on-the-spot investigations in case of aggression;

(c) Organization of United Nations military forces in substitution for the armed forces provided for under Article 43 of the Charter.

4. The Canadian Delegation should continue to act in close consultation with other responsible member states and should join with them in supporting reasonable proposals designed to achieve the objectives outlined in paragraph 3 of this memorandum, so long as these objectives are not achieved in a manner which would give the Soviet Union a valid reason for saying it had been driven from the United Nations. If it appears necessary to the formulation of a resolution likely to be generally acceptable to a majority of the Assembly, the Delegation could act as a co-sponsor, but it should not seek to assume this responsibility.

ELECTIONS TO COUNCILS AND SELECTION OF OFFICERS

5. Whatever modification should be made, membership of the Security Council should be of a high standard, states should be chosen on the basis of their ability to accept the responsibilities which go with membership, and due regard should be paid to the representation of geographical areas. Of the member states seeking election the most suitable choices for Canadian support now appear to be: Turkey, in place of Egypt, for the Middle Eastern seat; Brazil, in place of Cuba, for one of the two Latin American seats; and the Netherlands for the seat which is being vacated by Norway.

6. For membership on the Economic and Social Council, on which Canada has still over two years to serve, the Canadian Delegation should support the United Kingdom, Sweden, Uruguay, Australia, U.S.S.R. and Egypt; and for the Trusteeship Council, Thailand, as an Asian successor to the Philippines, and the Dominican Republic.

7. For the Presidency of the General Assembly, a contest has developed between Sir Zafrullah Khan (Pakistan) and Mr. Nasrollah Entezam (Iran). The choice between these candidates is complicated by the facts that both are Moslems and that both are good candidates. The Canadian Delegation should support Sir Zafrullah Khan, and should at the same time use its influence to avoid a situation in which the failure of either candidate to secure an adequate majority might lead to the election of a Latin American nominee.

8. A delicate question on the agenda is the appointment of the Secretary-General. At the present time it appears unlikely that a suitable new candidate, acceptable to the Soviet bloc and to other members, will be found. In view of the difficulty of securing agreement on an acceptable alternative to Mr. Trygve Lie, and in view of the generally satisfactory service he has rendered under difficult circumstances, the Canadian Delegation should join in supporting any practicable proposal to re-appoint him or extend his term for a further year.

POLITICAL AND SECURITY QUESTIONS

9. The Asian issues likely to come before the Assembly are dealt with in an accompanying memorandum. Among other important items is the membership question. Nothing that has happened since the fourth session of the Assembly indicates that a way out of this impasse will be found. It is unrealistic to hope for an amendment to the Charter which would relax the terms of admission, and there seems little likelihood of a horse trade whereby all outstanding applicants would be admitted. If, however, the Assembly should show renewed interest in such a bargain, the Canadian Delegation should insist on the inclusion therein of Spain. On this basis the applicants which the Canadian Delegation could support would be: Austria, Ceylon, Finland, Ireland, Italy, Jordan, Korea, Portugal, Nepal and Spain; on the Soviet side, Albania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Roumania and Outer Mongolia would be included. The Canadian Delegation should support any responsible efforts which might develop towards the admission of the ten Western-sponsored candidates and in the probable event that these efforts will be to no avail, should take advantage of any opportunity to place the blame for the non-admission of these states on the Soviet Union.

10. It is unlikely that any concrete new proposals on the international control of atomic energy will be submitted to the forthcoming session of the Assembly. Some thought was given last winter, on an official level only, to modifications which might be made in the present United Nations majority plan, without affecting the essential provisions for international inspection. In the present situation, however, discussion of this subject is hardly likely to be more than a propaganda debate. It is probable that India, or one of the smaller countries, will demand action of some kind and the Western countries must be prepared to meet the charge that they are "standing pat" on the majority plan. In effect, however, no major modifications in this plan are at present contemplated. The Canadian Delegation should continue to act in close consultation with other friendly and responsible members of the Atomic Energy Commission, including, in particular, the United States, the United Kingdom and France.

11. The Assembly will have before it a special report from the Trusteeship Council on the question of an international regime for Jerusalem and the protection of the Holy Places. The Trusteeship Council has found it impossible to implement the proposal for full internationalization recommended by the last session of the Assembly. This finding has in fact vindicated the attitude taken at that time by the Canadian Delegation, namely that the scheme was impracticable. It now appears likely that a new proposal will be advanced, providing for a very limited form of internationalization and for the establishment of a U.N. High Commissioner to supervise the protection of the Holy Places. The Canadian Delegation should support a workable plan along these lines.

12. The Interim Committee will present a report to the Assembly on the disposal of the former Italian colony of Eritrea. It appears probable, following the first-hand investigation of a U.N. Commission and subsequent discussion in the Interim Committee, that a form of federation of Ethiopia and Eritrea will be the most feasible and acceptable solution. Canada has broadly favoured this solution in the Interim Committee during the past two months, and the Canadian Delegation to the Assembly should support, and if necessary co-sponsor, a resolution determining the disposal of Eritrea in this way. It will also be necessary for the Assembly to decide whether or not to continue the United Nations Special Committee on the Balkans. As it is generally agreed that the danger of attack from Bulgaria is not over and that the Committee is performing a useful function, the Canadian Delegation should vote in favour of its continuation for a further year. On the question of human rights in Bulgaria, Hungary and Roumania, the Delegation should support any reasonable proposal which might have the effect of aiding the victims of persecution in Eastern Europe or of demonstrating the validity of the charges brought against the governments concerned.

13. The Assembly will be asked to consider a draft resolution rescinding the December 1946 United Nations resolution on relations of member states with Spain. The draft resolution with United States and Latin American support, will probably win a two-thirds majority. Canada did not favour the original resolution but has previously abstained on votes to rescind. The Delegation could now support the rescission of the operative parts of this resolution which is becoming increasingly unrealistic and ineffective.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL QUESTIONS[22]

14. The main economic subject will be a recommendation from the Economic and Social Council with respect to measures to be taken by member states to attain economic stability. The Canadian delegation may support the general principles of endeavouring to exchange as much information as is useful and can readily be made available among states in order that they may gradually integrate their economies and avoid economic disruption. However, the delegation should be mindful of the limitations which must be placed upon forecasting of economic information and should take care that the compilation of huge reports is not mistaken for an end in itself.

15. The Assembly will consider several matters relating to refugees. Care should be taken to avoid the establishment of a permanent category of persons known as refugees. The Delegation should endeavour to retain to national governments and to the individuals concerned as much control as possible over the activities of these persons consistent with the proper supervision of their welfare by an international office or agency.

[22] Une note infrapaginale a été insérée ici :/A footnote was inserted here:
"The Draft Covenant on Human Rights is dealt with in a separate memorandum."†

16. The Economic and Social Council has recommended to the Assembly the establishment of an International Children's Endowment Fund. The Delegation should endeavour to ensure that states are not, in consequence, called upon to bear large financial burdens, particularly if these do not appear to be justified by the results which the Fund is likely to produce.

FINANCIAL QUESTIONS

17. The Delegation should, as in previous years, encourage the efficient and economical administration of the United Nations, scrutinize the budget in order to limit expenditure without impairing essential services, and oppose the adoption of proposals which would needlessly increase the costs of operation. There is likely to be a reconsideration of the allocation of contributions to states which, because of post-war dislocations, received low assessments. This may result in pressure to reduce slightly the United States allocation and increase the Canadian assessment. The Delegation may support any reasonable re-allocation of contributions provided that the reduction of the United States assessment is kept to a minimum; the increase in the Canadian contribution does not exceed .1 percent of the whole budget; the principle of a per capita ceiling is maintained; and every effort is made to raise the contributions of Communist states to their proper level.

TRUSTEESHIP QUESTIONS

18. Last year the most serious breach among the democratic countries took place in the Trusteeship Committee. Since that time there have been useful conversations between the United States, the United Kingdom and France, with some compromises made on all sides. However, there is bound to be some divergence between the European and Asian delegations on this subject. Last year the Canadian representative played a useful role behind the scenes in seeking agreement by compromise. Even though Canada is not directly concerned with trusteeship questions, the Canadian Delegation should continue its efforts to reconcile the points of view of administering and non-administering powers.

ASIAN QUESTIONS BEFORE THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

One of the principal struggles between the Western and Soviet delegations at the Fifth Session of the General Assembly will be for the support of Asian governments and Asian public opinion for their respective policies. It is a generally accepted thesis that the principal reason for the Soviet Government ending its boycott of the United Nations Security Council was its belief that it was foregoing a valuable platform from which to influence Asian public opinion on world issues. In the struggle between the North Atlantic group of powers and the Soviet Union and its satellites, the countries of Asia offer the best field for Communism to make military and political gains. The teeming populations and vast resources of Asia would, if absorbed, add greatly to the strength of the Communist bloc. A reduction in Western influence in Asia would militate against the strength of the non-Communist world. Because an element of misunderstanding has arisen between Asian countries led by India and a majority of the United Nations members led by the United States over the question of relations with China, the Soviet Delegation to the General Assembly which will be led by Foreign Minister Andrei Vishinsky, may be expected to try its best to widen the breach. Canadian effort should be directed toward eliminating misunderstanding and bridging, where possible, the gaps between the policies of the United States Government and those of Asian governments, bearing in mind that the flexibility of United States policies will be limited by the November congressional elections and that on the other hand Asian opinion may become impatient with the delays of American politics and, therefore, more susceptible to Soviet propaganda.

Chinese representation, a post-hostilities settlement for Korea, the United States "neutralization" of Formosa, and Chinese Nationalist charges of Soviet intervention in the Chinese civil war will be the principal Asian questions that may be brought before the General Assembly. Other issues, such as South West Africa, may give rise to misunderstanding between the Asian and Western delegations. Because the Korean and Formosan questions are still before the Security Council and because the report of the United Nations Korean Commission and the report of the Interim Committee on the Nationalist charges of Soviet intervention have not yet been published, it is not possible to lay down hard and fast detailed instructions for the Canadian Delegation. The following paragraphs, however, suggest an approach to each of these problems based on information presently available.

[23] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 12 septembre 1950.
Approved by Cabinet, September 12, 1950.

Chinese Representation

Because the Peking Government firmly controls the mainland of China and has an army of about three million veteran troops, it would be realistic politics for the United Nations to do whatever is possible to secure the acquiescence if not the cooperation of that government in the maintenance of peace in the Far East. One way of going about this would be to give an opportunity to the Peking authorities to express their views before appropriate United Nations bodies on Far Eastern security questions. The United Nations will be a healthier association if dissenting views are stated inside the organization rather than outside. If the Chinese Communists are not given an opportunity to state their own case it will be stated for them by the Soviet Delegation with their own twist. The Indians, too, would no longer require to assume the part of eloquent apologists for Communist China. If the Chinese Communists were given the chance to state their own case and did so in the intemperate language they have learned from the Soviets the Indians might be constrained to adopt a more objective attitude than they are now assuming. The Canadian Delegation should, therefore, support the hearing of Chinese Communist representatives before appropriate United Nations bodies in matters pertaining to the peace of the Far East such as Formosa and the Korean settlement where their acquiescence is desirable. Common justice demands that both sides be heard in the Formosan case at least.

As regards a possible change in Chinese representation from Nationalist to Communist the Canadian Delegation should support any move which would delay a final decision on credentials until after the Assembly had had an opportunity to consider the item proposed by Cuba entitled "Recognition by the United Nations of the Representation of a Member State". Such delay would permit the heat of the United States election campaign to subside and also give the delegation an opportunity to estimate the development of the attitudes of other delegations on the question of Chinese representation.

The United Kingdom Cabinet have decided to vote in favour of seating the representative of the Peking Government at the General Assembly if this question is raised on its merits and the Peking Government has not before then performed some significant unfriendly act such as attacking Formosa or openly aiding the North Koreans. As even Chinese Nationalist leaders admit that the grip of the Peking Government on the mainland is unshakeably firm it seems somewhat unrealistic to continue to accept the Formosan Government as representing "China", particularly when they seem to be doing all in their power to bring on a third world war as the only hope of reestablishing their position in China. When the vote is finally taken in the Assembly on the question of which group should represent "China" the Canadian delegation may, in the light of circumstances then prevailing, avoid giving its support to either side by abstaining.

Formosa

The Formosa question, which is now on the agenda of the Security Council, may also be brought before the General Assembly in one way or another. The General Assembly might be asked to call on both the Chinese Nationalists and Communists to cease any hostile action against each other until the United Nations has reestablished peace and security in the Korea area. A resolution in this sense would be advantageous if observed. The Delegation should consider carefully, however, what action the United Nations might be under moral compulsion to take if the resolution was not heeded by one of the parties.

With regard to the ultimate disposition of Formosa, the attitude of the Canadian Delegation should be that in principle Canada adheres to the Cairo declaration, which promised the restoration of Formosa to the Chinese state. This promise was confirmed by the Potsdam Agreement, upon which the Japanese Instrument of Surrender was based and which was signed by Canada. The political wisdom of repudiating wartime undertakings is doubtful. Furthermore the de facto administration of Formosa by the Chinese Government has been acquiesced in by the Canadian Government, through acceptance of a note from the Chinese Government in 1946, stating that Formosa was restored to Chinese sovereignty and that Formosans had regained their Chinese citizenship; through agreement that the Commercial Modus Vivendi with China should cover Formosa; and through various administrative actions.

The question of possession of Formosa cannot be extracted from its Chinese Civil War context and treated as a separate problem. In matters of this sort it has been Canadian policy to be prepared to make offers of good offices in order to help bring about an end to disputes, but not to favour the imposition of a solution upon one side or the other. The Canadian Delegation should follow this line with regard to the Formosa problem and should be ready to put forward or support any compromise proposal which might have the effect of lessening the differences between the United States and Asian countries in this matter and of reducing, in consequence, the likelihood of a Chinese Communist assault upon Formosa.

Chinese (Nationalist Government) Charges Against Soviet Russia

The Interim Committee not having dealt with the Chinese charges of Soviet violation of the United Nations Charter and of the Sino-Soviet Treaty (1945) through intervention in the civil war, it is likely that this matter will again be referred to the General Assembly.

The Canadian attitude to this question has been that it should be played down, on the grounds that to pursue the Chinese charges would be impractical, since most of the alleged violations of the Sino-Soviet Treaty of 1945 occurred some years ago and at a time when the Nationalist Government was still in control of the mainland, whereas now the Chinese mainland is in de facto control of a government, recognized by a considerable number of United Nations members, which would oppose investigation of the charges. Discussion of the Chinese charges was also considered politically undesirable, because it was not wished to draw Soviet counter-charges of United States intervention in the Chinese Civil War in support of Chiang Kai-shek.

The Canadian Delegation should maintain this attitude in principle but it should be prepared for the Chinese Nationalist charges against Russia to be brought into full debate in the Assembly, if the United States is widely and effectively assailed in the United Nations by the Soviet Union on the score of intervention in the Chinese Civil War when the Formosan question is discussed.

Korea: Post-hostilities Settlement

Consideration of the Report of the United Nations Commission on Korea will provide an opportunity to pass the question of the post-hostilities settlement for Korea from the Security Council to the General Assembly. There is a precedent for this procedure in the Palestine case where the Assembly considered long-range settlement problems while the Security Council was trying to stop the fighting. In the Korean case the Assembly provides the only means of getting around the Soviet veto in the Security Council. In dealing with this question the Assembly is on strong ground as it has had the problem of the independence and unification of Korea under consideration for three years and has made this one of the principal missions of its Korean Commission.

It is important that the Report of the Korean Commission should be placed as high as possible on the agenda in order that there may be sufficient time for careful study of the difficult question of a post-hostilities settlement for Korea.

The Canadian Delegation should seek support for a proposal that, after receiving the Report of the Korean Commission and providing an opportunity for general discussion of the Korean question, the Political Committee should move quickly to pass a resolution along the following lines:

> The Political Committee established a sub-committee composed of representatives of Australia, India, Pakistan, Philippines and Sweden, under the chairmanship of India, to consider the question of a post-hostilities settlement for Korea and to make a report to the Committee by November 15 including a draft resolution or resolutions by which the General Assembly may deal with this question. In formulating its recommendations the sub-committee shall take into account the resolutions on Korea adopted by the General Assembly and the Security Council. The sub-committee may hear evidence from any witnesses who seek to present their views in person or in writing and whom the sub-committee considers it would be useful to hear, having in mind the date for submitting its report to the Committee.

It is contemplated that the sub-committee would submit a draft resolution which would recall the previous Assembly resolutions and establish a new Korean Commission. It is hoped that this new Korean Commission would have perhaps a majority of Asian members, but would not include China (which is on the present Commission). This Commission could serve in an advisory capacity to the Commander of United Nations forces in Korea and the Government of the Republic of Korea. It should be charged with the conduct of negotiations with the North Korean authorities in regard to the terms of surrender, the establishment of a provisional United Nations administration in North Korea, the observation of elections in North Korea, and consultation concerning the establishment of a unified Government for Korea, and assisting that Government in the task of rehabilitation.

It would not be appropriate for the United Nations to request new elections in South Korea as it has approved those held there in May 1948 as "a valid expression of the free will of the electorate in that part of Korea". The second set of elections held in South Korea on May 30, 1950 are reported to have resulted in the election of a pretty representative Assembly that would probably have proceeded to compel reforms in the rather autocratic administration of President Syngman Rhee if the Northern aggression had not intervened. A demand for new elections in South Korea would question the validity of the earlier elections and this does not seem desirable.

It is not necessary or desirable for the United Nations to recognize President Rhee's claim to jurisdiction over the whole peninsula (see article 4 of the Constitution of the Republic of Korea). Indeed, Canadian recognition of the Republic of Korea, extended July 14, 1949, acknowledged that its jurisdiction only extended to the 38th parallel. A similar attitude was taken by other Governments. Accordingly it would seem appropriate for the United Nations to take over the administration of North Korea until elections have been held there and the elected representatives have met with the elected representatives of South Korea to review the Constitution and important legislation before announcing that the Government of the Republic of Korea has assumed jurisdiction over all of Korea.

Article 53 of the Constitution of the Republic of Korea provides that the President and Vice-President shall be elected by the National Assembly by a two-thirds majority of those present with a quorum for this purpose of two-thirds of the members of the Assembly. As elections in North Korea would add about another 100 members to the 210 members of the present Assembly it would seem appropriate to have a new election for President and Vice-President when the enlarged Assembly is brought together. This would meet criticisms that have been levelled against President Rhee and his administration. If he were re-elected he would have a new and more broadly based mandate; if not, Korea would have a new administration.

Repeat Washington No. 115.

Reid and I think that the most important point which emerged during our informal consultations with the United States and United Kingdom delegations yesterday concerning the forthcoming assembly was the clear indication on the part of the United States delegation of a firm and uncompromising attitude in regard to the question of Chinese representation. We had thought they might say that they would not themselves vote for seating the Chinese Communists but would acquiesce in whatever decision was taken by the Assembly. Instead of this, they said that it was of the greatest importance to them that the Chinese Nationalists should continue to represent China and that the Chinese Communists should not be seated. They said that this was because of the situation in Korea, which made it impossible for them to adopt now the somewhat more flexible attitude they had previously adopted. We pressed them for a further explanation of their new position, and it then became clear that their main concern was to avoid undermining in any way the position of Tsiang in the Security Council. They pointed out that on two occasions Tsiang's vote had been essential in order to get a majority for an important resolution, and so long as the situation in Korea remained unresolved, they were unwilling to contemplate losing Tsiang's vote. We asked them whether this meant that they would expect the Assembly to regard the representatives from Nationalist China in exactly the same way as in previous years, that is, giving them a vice-presidency and their share of other offices. The Americans said they had not yet thought of this aspect of the question, but I judge that they will probably wish to have the Chinese delegation treated exactly as if nothing had happened in China.

2. This led to a general discussion of the problem of relations with China, in the course of which the British made no comment whatever. Reid and I said that no decision had been taken by the Canadian Government in regard to its policy on China at the Assembly and that we had no instructions on the subject. We then tried to put the discussion on an informal and exploratory basis, and mentioned some of the difficulties which exist for the Western Powers because of our present relations with China, seeking to find out from the Americans present whether they were concerned about these problems or whether they had any idea about a solution.

This effort was unproductive. The best we could get from them was the remark that once the situation in Korea had been cleared up, it might be possible for them to review their policy in regard to China.

3. As the meetings were breaking up, word was brought in concerning the Chinese Communist appeal to the Security Council.[24] We saw the Americans later in the evening, and they said that they had no inclination to dodge this issue and were prepared to take on the discussion in the Security Council. We asked them what policy they would adopt in regard to granting a hearing for the Communist Chinese, who would now appear in the role of complainants. They said they had not yet decided on a policy in this regard.

4. In the course of the discussions we also mentioned your proposal that a small Commission including a majority of Asian States should be set up to recommend a long term settlement in Korea, and we read them a section from your Vancouver speech on this subject.[25] The United Kingdom officials present had no comment to make on the suggestion. The American reaction was unfavourable. They indicated alarm over the prospect of a Committee with a majority of Asians making recommendations on a Korean settlement, and their alarm was not diminished by the suggestion that the chairmanship of the Commission should be given to an Indian.

5. A full report† of the discussions is now being prepared and will be brought back to Ottawa by Reid. It seems to me that we should now consider whether we should formulate your proposal about Korea in a draft resolution, and tell the Americans and British that we were proposing to offer it to the Assembly in connection with the Korean item.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Coulson of the United Kingdom delegation informs me that United Kingdom officials now agree with the Americans that it would be best to secure a clear-cut decision on the question of Chinese representation at the beginning of the Assembly. He thought it possible that Bevin and Acheson would agree to make statements saying that an honest difference of opinion on questions of this nature was natural in a democratic process, and that they would go their separate ways. He also thought that the Americans would agree to hold out some hope of reconsideration in the not too distant future. Coulson said that he thought that there was also some possibility that India would try to take the initiative away from the Soviet Union by itself proposing a resolution to the effect that the representatives of Peking should be seated in place of the Nationalist representatives.

2. I said I still thought there might be some advantage in avoiding a situation in which we would be forced by the Russians to record at the very beginning of the Assembly our differences of view about Chinese representation. It was with this in mind that we had suggested the possibility of taking the initiative away from the Russians by initiating some process of enquiry into the circumstances, and meanwhile applying Rule 29 of the rules of procedure.[26] Coulson said he did not think there was any possibility of avoiding a clear-cut decision at the beginning of the Assembly, and his information, contrary to impressions which we had received from the Americans through other sources, was that the State Department had also come to this conclusion.

1. Coulson of the United Kingdom delegation telephoned this morning to say that the Indians had now definitely indicated that they would try to get the initiative on the question of the representation of China and put in a resolution in favour of a change. He said that the disposition of the United Kingdom Government was to support a resolution of this kind.

2. I mentioned to Mr. Pearson this morning the information we had received that the United Kingdom and United States delegations were now agreed that they should face the question of Chinese representation at once, rather than postpone it. Mr. Pearson said that in that case we would not press our own views about deferring the question. In view, however, of information given to me this morning by the Secretary-General,[27] and communicated to you in another telegram, I tried to leave it open with Coulson that we might support a movement for postponing the question, if one developed.

CHINESE REPRESENTATION

Following for the Prime Minister from Pearson, Begins: At a meeting of Commonwealth delegations called on Tuesday morning [September 18] by Mr. Bevin, the question of Chinese representation was discussed at length. Bevin explained United Kingdom position. Indian delegate said that he was proposing a resolution calling for the seating of the Peiping Chinese, and explained reasons which led them to take this initiative. Pakistan representative said that he would support the Indian resolution. Australian, New Zealand, and South African delegates indicated they would oppose it. I said that I would either abstain or support the Indian resolution, depending on the way in which the debate developed.

[28] Voir/See United Nations Resolutions, Series 1, Resolutions Adopted by the General Assembly, Volume 3, 1950-52, Dusan J. Djonovich, New York: Oceana Publications, 1973, p. 98.

2. Bevin concluded this part of the discussion by saying that he very much hoped some sort of action could be taken to prevent the door being slammed on Communist China at the opening of this Assembly. He added that he very much wished Commonwealth delegates could work out some formula to avoid this kind of result. I then remarked that we had been considering a resolution which would call for some kind of special consideration of the question of Chinese representation at the Assembly and which would seat the Chinese Nationalist representatives while this matter was being considered. A resolution of this kind might be introduced alongside the proposed Indian resolution. If the Indian resolution were defeated, as would likely be the case, Western delegates would then have an alternative resolution for which they could all vote and which would have the effect of demonstrating that we were prepared to give careful consideration to question of Chinese representation on its merits. Other Commonwealth delegations showed considerable interest in this suggestion and we agreed to try to prepare a draft.

3. I subsequently consulted our own delegation and the draft was then prepared and shown to the United Kingdom and United States delegations, and altered in accordance with their suggestions. The United States delegation did not like our proposal at all, and would have preferred us not to make it. It was in accordance with their suggestion that a reference to the Cuban resolution on the basis of representation was included. A further amendment, suggested in the course of the debate by Australia, affecting the method by which a special committee would be chosen, was accepted. Text of our resolution as finally adopted[29] is given in my immediately following teletype.†

4. When Assembly opened, Rau immediately put the Indian resolution calling for the seating of the representatives of the new Chinese Government. Vyshinsky then proposed two resolutions, one expelling the Nationalist Chinese, and the second installing the Communist Chinese. My resolution had meanwhile been distributed, and in the course of the discussion received a good deal of support.

5. When the voting was finally taken, the Indian resolution was defeated, sixteen votes in favour, thirty-three votes against, and eighteen abstentions. I abstained, a course made easier by the fact that we had already submitted our own resolution for dealing with this matter.

6. The Chairman then ruled that my resolution, having been filed with the Secretariat next in order, should now be voted. The resolution was put in two parts, with the following results:

First part—38 for, 6 against, 11 abstentions
Second part—42 for, 8 against, 6 abstentions
Resolution as a whole—42 for, 9 against, 6 abstentions.

7. The two USSR resolutions were then put to the vote. The first one was defeated, ten votes for, thirty-eight votes against, and eight abstentions, and the second one was defeated eleven votes for, thirty-seven against, and eight abstentions. Since I had already voted in favour of my own resolution, which provided for a different disposition of the question of Chinese representation, I voted against the two Soviet resolutions, and this was the case with a number of other delegations which had originally voted "yes" or abstained on the Indian resolution.

8. Our resolution had, I think, the effect which we desired: It provided a procedure in regard to Chinese representation upon which the great majority could agree (both the United Kingdom and United States delegations voted for it, although they had divided on the Indian resolution). It also established a procedure in regard to Chinese representation which does more than merely shelve the question indefinitely, as the United States delegation seemed to wish. Ends.

1. This Committee met for the first time this morning, in closed session, and Sir Benegal Rau was unanimously elected Chairman. The text of the communiqué which was issued at the end of the meeting is contained in my immediately following teletype.†

2. At the very outset Romulo proposed that the Committee should not discuss the question before it, while Chinese forces were "shooting" at United Nations forces, and that it adjourn to await the results of the Committee of Three to determine the basis for a cease-fire in Korea.[31] Romulo may have been asked by the United States to put forward this proposal, as Raynor of the State Department approached us with the same idea just prior to the meeting. Romulo's proposal was immediately opposed by Katz-Suchy of Poland,[32] who repeated the stock argument in favour of Chinese Communist representation, tried to show that this question and the cease-fire were two different matters, and that as a consequence, they should not be linked together. He formally proposed that the Central People's Government should be seated in the United Nations and that the present Chinese delegation's credentials should be considered invalid.

I supported this suggestion. After some further discussions, during the course of which Katz-Suchy defended Chinese intervention in Korea, a vote was taken, and the Iraqi proposal was adopted by 3 in favour (Canada, Iraq and Mexico), 1 against (Poland) and 2 abstentions (Philippines and India).

4. The special Committee then discussed the text of the communiqué to be issued to the press, and this brought forth a sharp exchange between Romulo and Katz-Suchy, who insisted that the Polish proposal be mentioned in it. Because of this, Romulo insisted that his proposal be referred to as well.

PREPARATIONS FOR GENERAL ASSEMBLY

1. I asked Hickerson to lunch today in order to secure from him information on the latest planning in the State Department before my own departure for Ottawa tomorrow. He said that they were developing a 3-point programme dealing with the theme of united action to stop aggression. Active planning was well advanced on this programme in the Bureau of United Nations Affairs and he had discussed its general outline with the Secretary of State, but it was not as yet adopted as a definite policy of the State Department. He several times expressed the desire to receive from us ideas and comments on the proposals as soon as possible. He added that he had given fuller information to me about the programme than had yet been made available to his senior colleagues in the State Department.

2. The first point is that described in paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of my message WA-1543 of July 15th.† For convenience, however, I shall repeat the proposal here. The purpose is to find a means whereby the United Nations can organize action to meet a breach of the peace even after a veto in the Security Council. This could be done by changing the Rules of Procedure of the Assembly so as to provide for the automatic convening within twenty-four hours of a special session of the Assembly if the Security Council holds by a vote of any seven members that a breach of the peace has been committed, even if one or more permanent members vote against this finding. The effect would be to treat such a finding of the Security Council as a sort of procedural decision involving the convening of the Assembly immediately, even though negative votes might be cast by several permanent members. The Assembly so convened would then be in a position to make recommendations by a two-thirds majority, and these recommendations could be as far-reaching as those of the Security Council in the Korean case. He thinks that the proposal should include some standing provision for organizing through a Special Committee (or through the Interim Committee) the responses made by members to the recommendations of the Assembly, and he said that he would particularly welcome ideas on this point. You will note that there are slight changes in this proposal from the version put forward in my WA-1543, but it is substantially the same.

3. The second point in the programme would be the establishment by the Assembly of a Permanent Commission, which could by majority vote decide to conduct an investigation on the spot into a threat to the peace in any part of the world, provided that the country concerned were ready to receive them, and make recommendations. (Someone in the United States delegation in New York has made the ingenious suggestion, in order to keep the Security Council in the picture, that the recommendations made by this Permanent Commission could be rejected by a vote of seven members of the Security Council, which would mean the application of the veto in reverse.) This is fundamentally the same idea that was put forward late last week by the State Department in the hope that there would be agreement on action to this end by the Security Council on July 31st just before Malik's return. The British and French, however, refused to endorse the proposal, and it is now being re-vamped so that the Commission would be set up by the Assembly and not by the Security Council. The membership of the Commission might be identical with that of the Security Council.

4. The third point would provide for the establishment of a United Nations force, which could be employed for police or occupation duties in troubled areas and might also be used against open aggression. You are already familiar with the ideas to this end under discussion here and in New York. Hickerson said he could find no constitutional argument based on the Charter against the Assembly authorizing a force of this character. I gather that he would like to see a force of some size and would prefer that it should be financed from United Nations contributions. He recognizes, however, that it would be very difficult to secure the approval of two-thirds of the members to such a substantial addition to the budget. Part of the cost might be met by a lump sum vote. It is the prospect that, with the end of the fighting in Korea, occupation forces may have to remain there for a long time that has made the thought of an efficient United Nations force particularly attractive just now.

5. In my following message† I pass on some other information resulting from this discussion.

Mr. Wrong's Telegram WA-1676 of the 3rd of August: Preparations for the General Assembly.

In the first paragraph of Mr. Wrong's telegram under reference he said that Mr. Hickerson would like to receive any comments which we might care to make on the three-point proposal which was being elaborated in the State Department for presentation at the forthcoming Session of the General Assembly. The purpose of this message is to offer some preliminary comments on the programme which is under consideration in Washington designed to strengthen the United Nations and make it more capable of organizing united action to resist aggression.

2. In general, we support the proposals which have been made by Mr. Hickerson. Under present circumstances we feel that it is necessary to transform the United Nations so far as possible into an anti-communist coalition, in fact, if not in form. At the same time, we do not think that any action should be taken now which would be certain to force the withdrawal of the Soviet Union and its satellites from the United Nations. In our opinion, such action would be justifiable only if war with the Soviet Union appeared to be inevitable within a few months; and we do not believe this yet to be the case. Our chief reason for supporting the State Department's three-point programme is that it seems to us to go about as far in the direction of strengthening the United Nations to resist aggression as is possible without forcing the withdrawal of the Soviet Union.

3. In accordance with this general approach, we are in favour of the proposal, which is the first of the triad, to alter the rules of procedure of the General Assembly. It will be realized, however, that Article 12 of the Charter[33] may be considered to constitute a legal stumbling-block to the change which the State Department have in mind. At San Francisco our delegation argued that the question whether or not the Security Council was exercising in respect of any dispute or situation the functions assigned to it in the Charter was a question of fact which the General Assembly could decide itself. We maintained this even after the Charter had been signed, as you will see by referring to page 25 of the "Report on the United Nations Conference on International Organization" which was issued in 1945. Practice in the United Nations, however, may have made it harder now to sustain this argument. The custom seems to have grown up that the Council must vote to remove a question from its agenda before the General Assembly may make a recommendation concerning it. Even so, it should be possible to obtain such action in the Security Council notwithstanding the veto, since a precedent that occurred during discussion of the Greek question in 1947 has established that a vote to remove an item from the agenda is a procedural question, so long as the resolution does not contain a specific request to the Assembly to make a recommendation. We should be grateful if you could ascertain from the State Department whether they intend to use the argument which we advanced at San Francisco or whether they contemplate that the first step to be taken in the event of a veto by the Soviet Union to action in the Security Council designed to stop aggression should be a motion to drop the item from the Council's agenda.

[33] En vertu de l'article 12, l'Assemblée générale ne peut se pencher sur une question étudiée par le Conseil de sécurité.
Article 12 precludes the General Assembly from considering an issue which is before the Security Council.

4. It will be appreciated in the State Department that the obligation resting on individual members, as the result of a recommendation by the Assembly, will be substantially weaker than the obligation imposed by a recommendation of the Security Council. We have been wondering whether this obligation might not be strengthened by reverting to a suggestion which was made a few years ago by Mr. Hamilton Fish Armstrong[34] for a supplementary protocol to the Charter. Under this, the members of the United Nations who signed and ratified the protocol would undertake to carry out the Charter obligations to resist armed attack if two-thirds of the states parties to the protocol (or, perhaps, preferably two-thirds of the members of the General Assembly) decided that collective action was called for under the Charter and if the Security Council had failed to act. Alternatively, the obligations of individual members might be increased if at this Session of the General Assembly, after the rules of procedure have been altered, there were to be a succession of unilateral statements by members declaring that they would consider a recommendation by the General Assembly for collective action as being equally binding with recommendations of the Security Council. We are doubtful whether it would be wise to raise, at this Session, the proposal for a protocol to the Charter, since it is unlikely that India, for example, would be prepared to accede to it at this time. However, it seems to us a valuable method for reinforcing the obligation of members to act on a recommendation of the General Assembly; and we should be grateful if you would discuss it with the State Department.

5. The second proposal for a Permanent Commission of the General Assembly would also seem, in our view, to be valuable. We wonder, however, whether the object of this proposal could not be achieved more simply by merely authorizing the Secretary-General to send, at his discretion, military observers from the Panel of Field Observers established by General Assembly Resolution 297(IV)B of the 22nd of November, 1949, to any country which might consider itself threatened by armed attack. This alternative device might also have the advantage of giving the Soviet Union less chance for charging that the prerogatives of the Security Council in security matters were being infringed. We should welcome the State Department's views on this suggestion.

6. In discussing with the State Department their proposal for a Permanent Commission of the General Assembly you might mention that we are somewhat concerned over the possibility that if such a Commission were established the first place where its services might be requested might be Formosa. In our view, the status of Formosa is at the moment so equivocal that we would not think it appropriate for the new Permanent Commission to be despatched there as its first assignment.

7. The third proposal was for a United Nations Police Division in which volunteers would enlist individually and which would be trained, from the beginning, under United Nations auspices. As the Prime Minister indicated in his broadcast on the 7th of August,[35] the Government are, in principle, in favour of the raising of such a formation. But the practical difficulties to be overcome are very substantial. How would the formation be financed? What rates of pay would be applied? Where would it be trained? How would it be reinforced? And, most important of all, how would it be officered? We are giving urgent consideration here to these and other questions, and we would be grateful to have any indication that you may be able to provide of the State Department's thinking on these matters. We do not mean to suggest, however, that we regard any of these difficulties as insuperable.

8. In this connection, you might like to know that we are considering calling attention at this Session of the Assembly to the action of the Government here in raising a brigade which will be specially earmarked for service in fulfilment of our obligations under the Charter and under the North Atlantic Treaty. So far as we are aware, Canada is the only country to have taken such action and we think that it might provide a useful example for others. The earmarking by a number of countries of formations available for service on behalf of the United Nations should enable a United Nations force to be quickly assembled in future. This does not mean, however, that we are lukewarm in our support for the establishment of a United Nations Police Division, which would be a valuable adjunct to national contingents in a United Nations force.

Your EX-1378 of August 21st. Preparations for the General Assembly.

Matthews and Collins discussed with Hickerson this morning the comments you offered on United States three-point proposal.

2. Hickerson stated that the United States position was based on the desirability of keeping the Soviet Union in the United Nations at the present time and he therefore agreed with your paragraph 2. He mentioned that in a secret gallup poll, seventy percent of those questioned were in favour of expelling Russia and this reaction is obviously causing some worry to the State Department. If the Russians are to remain in the United Nations Organization, it will obviously be impossible to amend the Charter, and the main objective must be to operate through the existing machinery, which in turn requires strengthening of the position of the Assembly. Hickerson said that this point had been stressed in the recent State Department discussions with the Colonial Powers, in which it had been emphasized, for example, that the work of Committee 4 should be taken more seriously than had been perhaps been true in the past.

3. In regard to the proposal concerning Article 12, Hickerson believed that a large field of discussion would be open to the Assembly, even though items such as the Korean dispute remained on the Security Council agenda. He said that there would appear to be no reason why the Assembly should not at the present time discuss the final solution of the Korean problem, but stated that if the Assembly should find it necessary to take up the question of what further action should be recommended to meet aggression in Korea, the item would have to be removed from the agenda which, he agrees, could be done by a procedural vote. This is obviously the way in which the State Department would propose to act and not on the basis of the Canadian argument put forward at San Francisco, that the question of whether the Security Council was exercising its function was a question of fact.

4. Hickerson is not inclined to agree with your opinion that a recommendation of the Assembly would be substantially weaker than a recommendation of the Security Council. While the State Department have carefully considered proposals similar to that made by Mr. Hamilton Fish Armstrong for a supplementary protocol to the Charter, they have ruled this out at the present time because they feel that such action might force Russia out of the United Nations.

5. State Department has also considered the desirability of a unilateral statement declaring that a recommendation by the General Assembly for collective action should be binding. He stated that such a declaration would be in the nature of a blank check and gave the impression that this, largely from a domestic point of view, would not be acceptable to the United States. He stated that the United States would not object to binding itself in individual instances, for example, the commitment it has already made should there be further aggression against Greece.

6. Hickerson does not think use by the Secretary General of military observers from the panel would be a satisfactory substitute for the United States second proposal for a permanent commission of the General Assembly. He does not think that members of the panel would have a status equivalent to a permanent commission and he thinks that some questions might be raised as to the legality of the Secretary General using members of the panel for this purpose.

7. Hickerson made no comment on the point that it would not be desirable to have the Permanent Commission given, as its first assignment, duties in Formosa.

8. State Department still believe that a United Nations police division is desirable but have not yet reached any conclusions in their thinking on the proposals mentioned by you. They consider that such a force would be most appropriate as an occupation force after the Korean fighting is over. Their present thinking is apparently along the line of having the individual nations supervise recruiting of units of whatever size might be appropriate, the units, however, not to be available for national duties, but only for the United Nations. The dividing line between this concept of the State Department and the special national forces similar to the brigade which is being recruited in Canada, appear to be somewhat blurred.

9. State Department are considering having the American delegation introduce a recommendation at the Assembly that member nations should raise forces that would be part of their national forces but would be ear-marked as being available for services on behalf of the United Nations. This suggestion resulted from their consideration of action at present being taken by Canada and has been discussed with both the French and British and has received their favourable reaction. It was not forward in the discussions with the French and British as a Canadian proposal, that their idea resulted from Canadian action. State Department consider that the General Assembly should appoint a co-ordinator with a small staff, whose duties would be to give recommendations to National Governments concerning the recruiting, training, and equipping of these national units and who could endeavour to draw together the different units of smaller countries such as those of the Spanish-speaking Latin American countries. The co-ordinator would not be the operational commander in the event of units becoming involved in some police action and presumably the Unified Command would be determined as has been the case in Korea. Hickerson was careful to point out that this proposal would not be a substitute for the idea of recruiting a United Nations force as such. In Hickerson's opinion, the national forces should be ear-marked as being available for service under a United Nations Unified Command, but there would be no absolute commitment on the part of the National Governments to make them available whenever the Assembly recommended such action. This decision would be taken by each Government on each occasion when the Assembly passed a recommendation.

10. This message was dictated before receipt of Perm. Del's No. 595 to External.† The amendments to the original United States drafts mentioned in that message cover the same ground as paragraph 9. Hickerson, when referring to this this morning, said that United States was considering such a proposal but it was clear that no final decision has yet been taken. Ends.

Following is revised draft of United States "three-point" resolution discussed at pre-assembly meeting of Three Powers on 24th August. A report on this meeting is being prepared separately. Text of draft resolution begins:

Recognizing the obligations of members of the United Nations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security as set forth in the Charter,

Recalling its resolution 290 (IV) entitled "essentials of peace", and in particular the second and third paragraphs of that resolution in which the General Assembly called upon all nations "to refrain from threatening or using force contrary to the Charter" and "to refrain from any threats or acts, direct or indirect, aimed at impairing the freedom, independence or integrity of any State or at subverting the will of the people in any State",

Conscious that failure of the Security Council to discharge its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security on behalf of all the member States in no way relieves member States from their obligations under the Charter, and

Mindful of the role of the General Assembly and the importance of its contribution in the field of international peace and security, in order to carry out the principles and purposes of the Charter,

A

Resolves

1. That if the Security Council, because of the veto, fails to exercise its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security in case of a breach of the peace or an act of aggression, the General Assembly shall consider the question immediately with a view to making appropriate recommendations to the members for collective action, including the use of armed force, to restore international peace and security;

2. That for this purpose the General Assembly shall, if not in session at the time, meet in special emergency session which shall be called by the Secretary General and convened within 24 hours of the receipt of a request from:

A. Any 7 members of the Security Council;
B. Any member of the United Nations, concurred in by a majority of the members; or
C. The Interim Committee.

3. That notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in its rules of procedure, the General Assembly when meeting in special emergency session shall proceed to consideration of the subject for which the session has been convened immediately upon election of the President;

B

Establishes a General Assembly Peace Reconnaissance Commission composed of representatives of (9 members) for the purpose of ensuring immediate and independent observation in and reporting from any area in which international conflict or serious international tension develops;

Authorizes and requests the Interim Committee of the General Assembly to despatch the Commission or a subcommission thereof or observers to be selected by the Commission to any area where the Interim Committee deems their presence useful, upon the invitation or with the consent of the State into whose territory the Commission would go.

In the performance of its duties under the present resolution, the Interim Committee shall act in accordance with its terms of reference as set forth in resolution 295 (IV) except that its decisions shall be made by a majority of members present and voting;

Recommends to all Governments and authorities that they co-operate with the Commission and assist in the implementation of the present resolution;

Requests the Secretary General to provide the necessary staff and facilities utilizing where appropriate the United Nations panel of field observers envisaged in resolution 297 (IV)B.

C

The General Assembly

Invites each member of the United Nations to survey its resources in order to determine the nature and scope of the assistance it may be in a position to render in accordance with any United Nations action for the restoration of international peace and security;

Recommends to the members of the United Nations that, pending the creation of the armed forces provided for under Article 43 of the Charter, each member designate within its national armed forces a United Nations unit or units, to be so trained and equipped as to be available for prompt service on behalf of the United Nations upon determination by the Security Council or recommendation by the General Assembly;

Appoints _____ as United Nations military coordinator to consult on its behalf with the member States who wish to establish such units and to assist them in the organization, training and equipping of such units;

Establishes an ad hoc Committee consisting of representatives of _____ to study and report to the General Assembly on means which the United Nations might employ through collective action — including the use of armed force — in order to carry out the purposes and principles of the Charter;

Directs the ad hoc Committee in particular to study the questions of (a) measures not involving the use of armed force which might be taken by United Nations members collectively, and (b) methods for the collective use of United Nations units established or to be established by member States;

Authorizes payment of the coordinator's salary and expenses from the regular budget of the United Nations; and Requests the Secretary General to furnish to the coordinator and to the ad hoc Committee the staff and any assistance necessary for the effective accomplishment of their respective tasks. Text ends.

SECRET [New York], August 26, 1950

1. The first of these talks took place in the morning and afternoon of 24 August at the offices of the U.S. Delegation in New York. Reid, Riddell and Carter attended for Canada: Ross and Maffitt of the U.S. Delegation and Raynor and Bancroft of the State Department were present from the U.S.; Coulson (Shone's replacement), Laskey and Cole represented the U.K.

(1) U.S. THREE-POINT PROPOSAL

2. The first item discussed and the one which took much the most time was the U.S. Three-Point proposal which had been drafted in the form of one resolution with three sections. In introducing this new draft the Americans said they did not have any firm ideas yet as to whether they would submit one resolution or three, and, in fact, their attitude throughout the discussion of this item showed that the State Department were still fairly malleable concerning the details of this draft resolution.

3. Bancroft and Raynor explained that the U.S. proposal was based on the assumption that we did not wish to drive Russia out of the United Nations at the next Assembly and that an amendment to the Charter seemed impossible. For this reason the U.S. considered their proposal as being the most practicable device for strengthening the ability of the General Assembly to take action against future aggression without, however, having the effect of forcing out the Russians.

4. Reid said we had general sympathy with the State Department's approach and that we had always considered the General Assembly a second line of defence in political and security matters if the first line, the Security Council, proved inadequate. He agreed that we should concentrate on measures to strengthen the Assembly at the next session. He emphasized that such measures would not be successful unless they secured the support of additional potential allies — particularly the non-Communist Asian states. Reid summed up our position by saying there were three limitations which govern any measures submitted for strengthening the General Assembly at this session:

(a) amendments to the Charter would not be possible;

(b) we should not take action which would drive the Russians out;

(c) we must increase our alliance potential and, hence, must draw up proposals which would secure the support of such states as Sweden and India.

5. For the U.K. Coulson said that their position was so far very tentative. He emphasized, however, that the U.K. were not anxious to give up the veto in the Security Council, and for this reason had misgivings concerning the first section of the U.S. draft resolution. The U.K. might be more favourably disposed towards a simple proposal to amend the Assembly's rules of procedure in order to make possible an emergency session within twenty-four hours. Speaking generally, Coulson said that his Government were not yet "sold" on the U.S. proposal, as they considered that it might well have the effect of driving the Russians out of the U.N.

In the subsequent discussion in detail the following comments were made.

SECTION A

6. Reid suggested that it might be better to take out from Section A the provisions relating to a change in the Assembly's rules of procedure, and to treat these as a simple amendment to the rules of procedure. Perhaps all that was necessary was to amend Rule 8 regarding the summoning of special sessions. In answer to a question from Raynor he explained that we thought such a procedure would be likely to obtain the maximum support of the Assembly, as there might be a good many states prepared to support such amendments to the Rules of Procedure, which would not support some of the other paragraphs of the draft resolution. The Americans replied that, in their view it was important to make clear the significance of the proposed changes in the Assembly's rules of procedure in order to demonstrate that efforts were being made to make the U.N. effective in spite of Soviet obstruction. Ross added that the U.S. Delegation were getting two to three thousand letters a week asking them why the Russians were not thrown out of the U.N. Reid said he had not intended to suggest that all the first section should necessarily be deleted, but that it might simply approve revisions in the rules as set forth in an annex to the resolution. The Americans said that they would approach this with an open mind.

7. Reid added that the reference to the Security Council's inability to act "because of the veto" in the first paragraph of Section A might raise difficulties unless the Council's rules of procedure were altered. For example, the present deadlock in the Security Council did not arise from the veto, but rather because the Council's rules did not now prevent the President from refusing to bring a question to the vote. If the reference to the veto remained in Section A, an amendment to the Council's rules would be needed to ensure that a vote could be forced by a majority of members after a reasonable time. Reid's final point on Section A was that we doubted the value of bringing in the Interim Committee in paragraph 2, as this would probably delay the summoning of an emergency session of the Assembly. The Americans said they would consider this point.

SECTION B

8. Reid said our general approach to this section was that it might be better merely to despatch observers to countries requesting them, and that such requests should only be accepted from countries which considered themselves in clear and present danger of aggression. Was not the broad language in the present section dangerous in that "serious international tension" might develop in many parts of the world without, however, warranting the despatch of a commission of the Assembly or of observers? Reid added that in this section, as in section A, we had doubts as to the wisdom of bringing in the Interim Committee. Perhaps the best procedure might be to have the question of despatching such a commission left with any seven members of the Security Council, or, if this would raise constitutional difficulties, a committee of the General Assembly composed of the eleven states which were on the Council. The Americans said that they would approach these questions also with an open mind, but added that they were still inclined to favour using the Interim Committee for this purpose. They agreed that the language of the section might be too broad in its present form. To a query from Reid as to whether the first request for such a commission might not come from Formosa, the Americans made no comment.

SECTION C

9. Bancroft emphasized that the draft resolution's reference to national contingents being designated by member states did not mean that the State Department had abandoned the idea of a "foreign legion". He added that the United States thought this question needed further study and it would be one of the questions which the proposed Ad Hoc Committee might examine. Reid said we had doubts as to the value of such an Ad Hoc Committee and thought the questions it was asked to study could be better examined by a technical group of experts appointed by the Secretary-General rather than by a group of national representatives. The Americans said they preferred the idea of a committee of national representatives as they considered these questions to be essentially political rather than technical. Ross added that, while all three sections of the U.S. proposal must be considered as tentative at this stage, this was particularly true of Section C.

DESPATCH V-1061 Ottawa, August 30, 1950

PROPOSED GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION ON PEACE AND SECURITY

I enclose three copies of a draft resolution dated August 30 on peace and security.† This draft resolution is based on the United States draft resolution which was discussed at your meeting in New York on August 25.

2. I should be grateful if you would immediately give a copy of our new draft to the United Kingdom and United States delegations in New York. You should inform them that we are also sending copies direct to their governments through our missions in London and Washington. The Foreign Office and the State Department will be receiving the text of our draft resolution on Friday, September 1.

3. In giving the enclosed draft to the United Kingdom and United States delegations, you might indicate the main differences between our draft and the United States draft of August 25 and explain our reasons for suggesting these changes.

4. Part A of the United States draft has in our draft become paragraph 12 and the Annex, setting forth revisions of the rules of procedure of the General Assembly. Part B of the United States draft is covered in paragraph 6 of our draft. Part C of the United States draft is covered in paragraphs 7 to 10 of our draft.

5. Perhaps the chief difference is that we propose the establishment by the Assembly of a Commission on Peace and Security. The establishment of this Commission would, in our opinion, make it unnecessary to establish the two new bodies mentioned in the United States resolution — a General Assembly Peace Reconnaissance Commission and an Ad Hoc Committee to study and report on the organization, under the auspices of the Assembly, of collective action. It would also make it unnecessary to refer in the proposed revisions of the rules of procedure of the Assembly to a request for a special emergency session from "any seven members of the Security Council". Instead, we suggest that such emergency sessions could be summoned within twenty-four hours of the receipt by the Secretary-General of a request for such a session from the Commission on Peace and Security.

6. You will note that the language of paragraphs 1 and 2 of our resolution establishing the Commission and determining its membership follows very closely the language used by the Assembly in establishing the Atomic Energy Commission.

7. Another substantial difference between our draft and the United States draft is that we suggest in paragraph 6 of our draft that it would be sufficient, for the present at least, if the Commission on Peace and Security were authorized to despatch observers to a state which considers itself to be in clear and present danger of aggression. The United States draft contemplated that the Peace Reconnaissance Commission, or sub-commission thereof, might itself go to such an area. In our opinion it would be sufficient, in most cases, if observers were sent. If the presence of a Commission or Sub-Commission were desirable, then the General Assembly's Commission on Peace and Security could immediately have a special session of the Assembly summoned to authorize the despatch of a Commission or Sub-Commission.

8. Under paragraph 6 of our resolution, the observers will be sent only at the request of a state which considers itself to be in clear and present danger of aggression. This is narrower than the language used in the United States draft — "any area in which international conflict or serious international tension develops". We think it wise to make this limitation for the present at least, since the limitation would lessen the danger of the United Nations having to turn down requests from states for observers where they are not really required.

9. Under Part C of the United States draft, the Assembly would appoint an individual as "United Nations Military Coordinator" to consult on its behalf with the Member States who wish to establish within their national armed forces a United Nations Unit or Units and to assist these states in the organization, training and equipping of such units. The United States draft then went on to establish an Ad Hoc Committee consisting of representatives of designated states to study and report to the General Assembly on the whole question of the organization of collective action by the General Assembly. In paragraph 9 of our draft we assign these responsibilities to the Secretary-General, acting in consultation with the Commission on Peace and Security, and, in order to assist him in discharging this responsibility, we suggest in paragraph 10 of our resolution that the Secretary-General be authorized, with the concurrence of the Commission on Peace and Security, to secure the services of one or more military experts of international reputation. This would make possible the appointment by the Secretary-General of a United Nations Military Coordinator, if the appointment of such a Coordinator is found to be necessary. A Coordinator, since he would be appointed by the Secretary-General and not by the Assembly, would be subordinate to the Secretary-General. This would be in accordance with the principle, which we consider to be as important in international affairs as in national affairs, that the military arm be subordinate to the civil arm of government.

10. The language of paragraph 10 of our resolution would also make it possible for the Secretary-General to secure the services of one or more military experts to make the studies listed in sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph 9 of our resolution. We think that these studies could more effectively be carried on by experts acting in their individual capacities than by persons appointed by governments, as suggested by the United States. The kind of experts we would have in mind would be persons of the calibre of Lord Alexander and Admiral Nimitz. It might be that only one expert would be required, or it might be that it would be desirable to appoint three — one from the United Kingdom, one from the United States, and one from France.

11. There is one final point. We have suggested that the Commission on Peace and Security might be composed of one representative of each of those states represented on the Security Council and India, when that state is not a member of the Security Council. (This would be in accord with the precedent established by Canada's permanent membership on the Atomic Energy Commission.) The reason we have suggested this is that we consider it is important that democratic Asia be well represented on a Commission which, of necessity, will have to consider difficult Asian problems.

12. This would mean that normally three of the twelve members of the Commission would be representatives of Asian states (China, India, and a non-permanent member such as Turkey or an Arab state). Three out of twelve would certainly not be disproportionate and when a representative of Communist China is eventually seated in the Commission, the presence of a representative of the leading democratic state in Asia might be particularly helpful.

13. In addition to discussing with the United Kingdom and the United States representatives these differences between our draft resolution and the United States draft, it might be useful if you were to discuss informally a number of other points.

14. The Deputy Under-Secretary has informed me that you suggested to him yesterday that the passage by the General Assembly of a resolution along the lines of the enclosed might provide an occasion for the Assembly terminating the Interim Committee, since it could be argued that the main purposes for which the Interim Committee was established would be accomplished by the establishment of a General Assembly Commission on Peace and Security and by a procedure for calling special sessions of the Assembly on twenty-four hours' notice. There seems to be much merit in the suggestion which you have made and I think it would be useful if you were to take it up with the United Kingdom and United States delegations.

15. You also raised with the Deputy Under-Secretary the question whether Canada might be prepared to sponsor or be a co-sponsor of a resolution along the lines of the enclosed.

16. I would not wish to be put in a position of pressing to sponsor or to co-sponsor such a resolution. There appear, however, to be a number of pretty strong reasons why it might be wiser for the United States not to be the sponsor or a co-sponsor, particularly since sponsorship by the United States would increase the danger that the debate on the resolution might appear to be a struggle between the United States and the Soviet Union. Consequently, if it should be felt that Canada might usefully be a sponsor or co-sponsor of the resolution, I would be prepared to give this proposal sympathetic consideration and to take it up with my colleagues.

17. I enclose a copy of the United States draft resolution which was circulated in New York on August 25 at the confidential and informal U.K.-U.S.-Canadian pre-Assembly talks.[36]

18. I am sending to our High Commissioner in London and our Ambassador in Washington a copy of this despatch and of the enclosures and am asking them to Reference despatch V-1061 of August 30 — proposed General Assembly resolution on peace and security.

1. I spoke yesterday to Coulson of the United Kingdom delegation about the draft resolution on peace and security. He said that the United Kingdom Cabinet had now discussed the proposed draft resolution, and United Kingdom views had been reported to the United States delegation. According to Coulson, United States authorities have been told that United Kingdom Government could not (repeat not) accept part A of the United States draft resolution because they considered that it embodied so direct an attack on the position of the Security Council that it would drive the Soviet Union out of the United Nations. They also were concerned about the fact that part A might have the result of making the more responsible members of the United Nations vulnerable to irresponsible action in the Assembly. The United Kingdom Government would accept part B of the resolution, practically as it stands, and they would also accept part C in modified form. They did not think that the idea of a United Nations "Foreign Legion" could safely be developed at the present moment, but they were willing to support that part of the resolution requesting members to maintain armed forces available for prompt service on behalf of the United Nations.

2. Coulson then said that consideration had also been given to the Canadian redraft of the resolution. The United Kingdom found this redraft to be considerably more objectionable than the United States resolution, and they very much hoped that we would not press it. He said that our proposal to parallel the Security Council with an Assembly Commission of the same membership plus India would strengthen the assumption that we were replacing the Security Council with an alternative body and would increase the likelihood that the U.S.S.R. would for this reason pull out of the Assembly. He said also that, while the United States draft limited the proposed Commission to act in cases where the veto had been applied, no such limitation existed in our draft, and this would increase the danger of the Assembly acting in an irresponsible way which some members of the United Nations could not accept. In regard to the development of United Nations forces, he said that on the whole they would prefer to have this done by political bodies, as suggested in the United States draft, rather than by officials appointed by the Secretary-General. I formed the impression that Coulson was reporting official views only concerning the Canadian re-draft, and that only the United States draft had been considered by the United Kingdom Government.

3. I told Coulson that it seemed to us that some resolution of this kind would certainly emerge from the Assembly, and that if we were not careful we would find ourselves confronted with some loosely worded proposal along the lines of the Chilean statement. This being the case, our principal concern was that we should then secure the concurrence of other responsible states, and in particular India. I said that as far as our draft was concerned, I thought our intention had been to limit the effect of the original United States draft by making the wording more precise and by endeavouring to remove possible conflicts in jurisdiction between the Security Council and the proposed Commission. If we made the membership parallel, or almost parallel, we would in effect be making certain that the Assembly Commission would not act until the Security Council had exhausted its resources. If, alternatively, we made the membership of the Security Council and the proposed Commission differ in any marked degree, there would be a real danger of competition for jurisdiction. Finally I said that I thought it of great importance that we should get in early with the draft resolution upon which a number of responsible states had agreed, in order to avoid a position in which we would have to work on the basis of some loose and unsatisfactory draft put in by the Chileans or some other delegation.

4. Coulson seemed completely unconvinced by the explanations which I had given on our draft resolution, and repeated his earlier statement that the United Kingdom Government would not be able to accept it. As far as drafting was concerned, he said that the United Kingdom Cabinet had not yet finished its consideration of part 3 of the American resolution, and would not discuss it again until Monday next. It would therefore be difficult for them to do any drafting before the Assembly, although he appreciated the importance which we attached to getting in an early draft.

PROPOSED GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION ON PEACE AND SECURITY

1. Most of the discussion at yesterday's informal meeting with the United Kingdom and United States officials was on this subject. My immediately following teletype† reports on the other matters that came up in yesterday's discussions.

2. The discussion demonstrated that the points of difference between the three groups of officials were not as great as might have appeared from some of the messages which we have received from the British, though the United Kingdom representatives made it clear that on a number of points they still had not received precise instructions from their Government.

3. Though the United Kingdom officials still expressed considerable hesitation over Part A of the United States resolution, and over the corresponding sections of our resolution, they agreed that some action must be taken at this session of the Assembly to enable the Assembly to be called together quickly in the event of an emergency. The United Kingdom officials considered it was desirable to play down the importance of the necessary changes in the rules of procedure of the Assembly rather than to dramatize them as the Americans do in their draft resolution. The Americans still feel, however, the necessity to dramatize the proposed changes.

4. The Americans were not able to bring before us a text of the revisions which they would like to see made in the rules of procedure of the Assembly. We said that if it were felt that our proposed new rule 8(a) was too broad it could be changed to read: "If the Security Council, because of lack of the unanimity of the permanent members, fails to exercise its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security in case of a breach of the peace or an act of aggression, special sessions of the General Assembly may be summoned to meet within twenty-four hours of the receipt by the Secretary-General of a request for such a session from _____ ". This seemed to be regarded as a useful compromise.

5. The British felt strongly that the Interim Committee should not, by mere majority vote, be permitted to summon such a special emergency session of the Assembly, since the bare majority of the Interim Committee would not constitute a majority of the Assembly as required under Article 20 of the Charter. They agreed that their point could be met if the request of any member of the United Nations to summon a special emergency session was concurred in by a majority of the members of the United Nations, this concurrence being expressed either in the Interim Committee or in other ways.

6. On Part B of the American resolution, the Americans agreed that their language, under which the Commission or observers might be sent to "any area in which international conflict or serious international tension develops" was too broad. They considered that our language about a "clear and present danger of aggression" was too narrow and could also be criticized as being merely another way of referring to a threat to the peace, which it is the function of the Security Council to consider. After discussion, it was generally agreed that a possible compromise might be to refer to "any area in which international tension develops, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security." We reiterated what we had said in the memorandum accompanying our re-draft, that we were not inflexible in our proposal that only observers be sent and not the Commission or a Sub-Commission.

7. The Americans appeared anxious, at least for this session of the Assembly, to retain the Interim Committee and to use it for the purpose of Part B of their resolution. They realize that Part B of their resolution would need re-drafting since it was absurd that the Interim Committee would have the right to despatch the Reconnaissance Commission whereas there was no reference in the resolution to the right of the parent body, the General Assembly, to despatch the Commission or Sub-Commission or observers.

8. The Americans drew our attention to the fact that our draft provided that observers could be sent only at the request of the State concerned, whereas their draft referred to the invitation or "the consent" of the State concerned. They put up the argument for using their language that the State might not be willing to initiate a request for observers but might be happy to acquiesce in a proposal that observers be sent. This argument struck us as having a good deal of force.

9. The Americans said that they did not like the title they had suggested for the Commission, i.e., "General Assembly Peace Reconnaissance Commission" but no-one could for the moment think of a better title. On the number of members of the Commission they said that they were not wedded to nine members, and that anything from 9 to 14 would seem to them reasonable.

10. Neither the British nor the Americans liked our suggestion that the Commission would have the same membership as the Security Council plus perhaps India, and we did not press it. The British had no instructions on Part C of the American resolution and Coulson, the principal British representative, was, therefore, able only to express his personal views.

11. We said that our paragraph 8 incorporated the second paragraph C of the American resolution with one change which we had made in an effort to make it more palatable to the United Kingdom but we ourselves preferred the language of the American draft.

12. The Americans had done some re-drafting of their paragraph on the United Nations Military Co-ordinator and their suggestion is now that the Military Co-ordinator should be appointed by the Secretary-General "with the approval of the ad hoc Committee" referred to later in their resolution.

13. They were also willing to consider calling this official the United Nations Military Advisor rather than Military Coordinator.

14. The Americans contemplated an ad hoc Committee consisting of representatives of about 15 States to undertake the studies set forth in the American draft resolution. The compromise which the Americans appeared to be willing to make with our position was that the ad hoc Committee would conduct its studies "in consultation with" the United Nations Military Coordinator and, possibly, with the Secretary-General. The Americans also agreed that the terms of reference of the ad hoc Committee should include the item mentioned in our draft but not in theirs concerning "methods for the early establishment of a United Nations police division of volunteers recruited individually by the United Nations". Coulson of the United Kingdom group said that, while he had no final instructions on this, his people had grave doubts of the wisdom of establishing a United Nations "Foreign Legion".

15. You will see from the above that the Americans are still strongly of the opinion that it would be desirable for the Assembly to set up two bodies — one a "Reconnaissance Commission" and the other their ad hoc Committee. We said that we doubted whether you would wish to press our view at this session of the Assembly and the Americans indicated that they did not rule out the possibility, at some future session of the Assembly, of establishing a Permanent Bureau of the Assembly which might do the work both of the proposed Reconnaissance Mission and of the ad hoc Committee, and might also have power to summon special emergency sessions of the Assembly. The Americans are going to try their hand at doing a new draft of their resolution in the light of yesterday's discussions and hope to be able to show it to us today (Tuesday). It may contain alternative drafts of certain provisions.

16. Their present thought is that they should be one of the co-sponsors of the resolution, and that they would like to associate with them as co-sponsors, the United Kingdom, ourselves and, they would hope, a Western European (possibly the Netherlands), a Latin American (possibly Chile), India and perhaps a Middle Eastern State. We, of course, did not commit you to co-sponsor the resolution.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Repeat Washington No. 143.

1. Reference my teletype No. 662 of 12th September† — revised text of United States draft resolution on united action against aggression.

2. In comparing this new text of the United States draft resolution with the previous United States text (my teletype No. 601 of 25th August) I would like to draw your attention to the following points.

(a) The preamble

The first, third, fourth and fifth paragraphs in the preamble of the new United States text repeat, in slightly different form, the first, second, third and fourth paragraphs in the preamble of our own draft resolution. The second paragraph of the new preamble corresponds with the second paragraph in the former United States text (this paragraph had not been included in the preamble of the Canadian draft). The fifth paragraph of the new preamble corresponds not only with the fourth paragraph in the Canadian preamble but also with the third paragraph in the preamble of the original United States text. The sixth paragraph of the new preamble includes the second phrase in paragraph 1 of Part A of the former United States text. I understand that the reason the United States delegation have moved this phrase from Part A into the preamble is in order to meet suggestions that the preamble itself should contain all the "window dressing" necessary for the entire resolution.

(b) Part A

In paragraph 1 of the new Part A, the phrase "because of the veto" has been altered to read "because of lack of unanimity of the permanent members". This is in line with the suggestion made by us at the three-Power meeting on 11th September (see para 4 of my teletype No. 658).

Paragraph 1(b) in the new text has now been drafted in a manner which makes it clear that the request of any member of the United Nations to summon an emergency session of the Assembly must be concurred in by a majority of the whole membership of the United Nations before such an emergency session shall be summoned. This change was made primarily due to the point made by the United Kingdom delegation that a majority of the Interim Committee might not be equivalent to a majority of the full United Nations membership. (See paragraph 5 of our teletype No. 658.)

Paragraph 2 of Part A in the new text is similar to paragraph 12 in our own text. The United States delegation have informed me that they have not yet studied in detail the proposed changes in the rules of procedure contained in the annex to the Canadian draft, but I have no reason for believing that their own views on the necessary changes in the rules of procedure will differ substantially from ours.

(c) Part B

In paragraph 3 of Part B of the new text you will notice that the name of the proposed Commission has been altered to read "General Assembly Peace Patrol Commission". This paragraph also includes a reference to the General Assembly itself despatching the Commission or observers from the Commission, whereas the previous text referred only to the Interim Committee despatching the Commission of Observers. (See paragraph 7 of my teletype No. 658). The new paragraph 3 also alters the words "any area in which international conflict or serious international tension develops" in the former text to read "any area in which international tension develops, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security". This change is also based on agreement reached at the three-Power meeting on 11th September, (paragraph 6 of teletype No. 658).

Paragraph 4 of the new text authorizes the Interim Committee to despatch the Commission or observers and repeats substantially the language in the second paragraph of Part B of the former text. However one change has been made. The new text refers to the Interim Committee sending the Commission "to any area where in the view of the Interim Committee such tension exists". The former text referred to the Interim Committee despatching the Commission or observers "to any area where the Interim Committee deems their presence useful". The new language is thus less broad than the previous draft.

In the second phrase in paragraph 4 of the new text an important change has been made. The previous text stated that the Interim Committee should act in accordance with its terms of reference as given in resolution 295 (iv) "except that its decisions shall be made by a majority of members present and voting." The next text deletes this exception. This deletion has presumably been made to meet the point stressed by the United Kingdom delegation that the Interim Committee should act in this matter only by a two-thirds majority vote. Resolution 295 (iv) states in paragraph 2(e) that the Interim Committee may "conduct investigations and appoint Commissions of inquiry" but that decisions to conduct such investigations or inquiries require "a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting".

Paragraphs 5 and 6 in the new text repeat the wording in the last two paragraphs of Part B in the former text.

(d) Part C

Paragraph 7 in the new text is the same as the first paragraph in Part C of the former text. Paragraph 8 is also the same as the second paragraph in Part C of the former text. In paragraph 9 an important alteration has been made. The new text "requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations to appoint, with the approval of the ad hoc Committee provided for in paragraph 10, a United Nations military adviser". The former text would have had this official appointed directly by the General Assembly. The alteration in the designation of this officer from "military coordinator" to "military adviser" has been made in conformity with the suggestion made at the three-Power meeting on 11th September, (paragraph 13 of teletype No. 658).

Similarly in paragraph 10 an alteration has been made to make it clear that the studies to be undertaken by the proposed ad hoc Committee shall be done "in consultation with the Secretary-General and with the United Nations military adviser". This change also meets the point made by us at the three-Power meeting on 11th September (paragraph 14 of teletype No. 658).

This paragraph contains a clerical error in that it refers to the "ad hoc Political Committee". The word "political" should be deleted. I would prefer some other title for this Committee.

Paragraph 10(c) is an addition which meets the point in paragraph (9)(b)(III) of the Canadian text that studies should also be undertaken regarding "the early establishment of a United Nations police division of volunteers."

Paragraphs 11 and 12 correspond to the last two paragraphs in the previous United States draft.

3. My own impression is that the United States delegation has gone a long way to meet the points which we regarded as important, and that in doing so they have materially improved the text. The United States delegation have emphasized that this new text has been prepared only "on the official level" and that they have not yet had the opportunity of receiving clearance on it from the Secretary of State. I would appreciate your comments on this new text.

Following from Acting Under-Secretary. Your teletypes No. 662 of September 12† and 670 of September 13 concerning the revised United States draft General Assembly resolution on united action against aggression.

I agree completely with your impression that the United States delegation has gone a long way to meet the points which we regarded as important and that in doing so they have materially improved the text. Since they have gone so far to meet our position my feeling is that we should, for the present, not press them to make further substantial changes but should content ourselves with suggesting some minor, mostly drafting, improvements. The sooner these can be given to them the better since a resolution of this kind begins to jell pretty quickly. The following suggestions have occurred to me:

1. The term "United Nations Military Adviser" in paragraphs 9, 10 and 11 is an improvement over "United Nations Military Coordinator". It might however be still better if the official were called "United Nations Military Secretary".

2. The language in the middle of paragraph 1 could be improved. It reads in part as follows: "shall meet in special emergency session which shall be called by the Secretary General and convened within twenty-four hours of the receipt of a request". The word "convened" can mean both "summoned" and "meet". Due to this ambiguity it was decided three years ago never to use it in the Rules of Procedure of the Assembly. I suggest that the phrase which I have quoted might therefore read "shall meet in special emergency session within twenty-four hours of the receipt by the Secretary General of a request". The duty of the Secretary-General to summon a special emergency session can be dealt with in the revision of the Rules of Procedure.

3. Paragraphs 3 seems to require some revision. As it now stands the General Assembly can only despatch the Peace Patrol Commission, whereas under paragraph 4 the Interim Committee can despatch either the whole Commission or Sub-Commission thereof or observers selected by the Commission. It seems to me that it would be necessary to carry this same thought over to paragraph 3.

4. The last sentence of paragraph 4 states that the Interim Committee shall act in accordance with its terms of reference as set forth in Resolution 295 (IV). In order to understand what this means, people will have to look up Resolution 295 (IV). This kind of legislation by reference is bad in principle and in a resolution of this importance is, I think, undesirable. If the purpose of including this sentence is to provide that a resolution in the Interim Committee to propose a commission, etc., requires a two-thirds majority, it would be better to say so. This would mean deleting the last sentence of the present paragraph 4 and inserting after the words "authorizes and requests the Interim Committee of the General Assembly" the words "by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting".

5. I agree with you that it would be better if the Ad Hoc Committee established in paragraph 10 could be given some other title. I wonder if it might not be called "Committee on Collective Action".

6. In order to facilitate reference to the draft resolution in debate, it might be useful if the paragraphs of the preamble were numbered from one to six.

7. It looks a little odd to have the words "General Assembly" appear three times at the beginning of parts A, B & C. One way to avoid this would be to put the words "General Assembly" between the preamble and part A, since it would then apply to all the following paragraphs.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for Reid from Riddell, Begins: My immediately following teletype† contains current draft of United States resolution which now bears the title "Uniting for Peace". This revision is one agreed between Dulles, acting for the United States delegation, and the United Kingdom delegation.

2. At the insistence of the United Kingdom delegation, United States has now dropped the provision by which the General Assembly could meet in emergency special session on the call of a majority of members of the United Nations (paragraph 1). All that remains is a provision that the General Assembly may be called into emergency special session at the request of any seven members of the Security Council. This, however, appears to us to be directly contrary to the provisions of Article 20 of the Charter, which states that special sessions shall be convoked at the request of the Security Council or a majority of members of the United Nations. Paragraph 1 of the resolution must therefore either be regarded as an amendment of Article 20 of the Charter or as a direction to the Security Council that a resolution to summon a special assembly is a procedural one which can be carried by the vote of any seven members.

3. The provision in earlier drafts by which the Assembly could be called into special emergency session by a majority of the members of the United Nations has been dropped by the Americans under pressure from the British, who do not wish to put the Assembly in the position where it can meet quickly, because they are afraid of an irresponsible recommendation in the Assembly. They are afraid that, for example, if there were a Soviet invasion of Finland, the General Assembly might be called into immediate session, and in the emotional stress of the moment, recommend that military assistance be sent to the Finns at a time when that was clearly impractical.

4. It seems to me that the present draft in regard to the calling of a special emergency session is quite unsatisfactory, and I hope that we shall have the opportunity to discuss it further with the United States and United Kingdom delegation at an early stage. It may be that we are led back to our original suggestion that all the resolution need contain is an amendment in the rules of procedure which would make it possible for the special session as provided in Article 20 to meet within twenty-four hours rather than two weeks. This would avoid the challenge on constitutional grounds which can be made to the present wording, but would not, of course, overcome the apprehensions of the United Kingdom concerning an emergency special session summoned by a majority of members.

5. The third subparagraph of paragraph 10 has been omitted by the Americans on the insistence of the United Kingdom delegation. We shall have now to decide whether we wish to re-insert this subparagraph in spite of United Kingdom and United States objections.

6. I shall try to follow up the drafting points mentioned in your teletype No. 34 of September 27th.†

7. You may have an opportunity to discuss with the Minister when he is in Ottawa this weekend point raised in paragraph 1 of your teletype No. 42 of September 29th.† Ends.

TELEGRAM 69 Ottawa, October 4, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Riddell from Reid, Begins: Your teletypes Nos. 40 and 41† of September 29 on the United States draft resolution "Uniting for Peace".

1. I have discussed with the Under-Secretary and the Legal Division your concern that paragraph 1 of the resolution enabling any seven members of the Security Council to call an Emergency Special Session is directly contrary to the provisions of Article 20 of the Charter. We agree with you that it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile this provision with the Charter.

2. The only way out which has occurred to us is that the resolution should provide that any seven members of the Security Council may request the Secretary General to summon an Emergency Special Session; the Secretary General should immediately inform the other members of the United Nations of the request and enquire whether they concur in it; if a majority of the members inform him that they favour an Emergency Special Session, the Secretary General should summon it to meet within twenty-four hours.

3. The advantage of this proposal to the British is that an Emergency Special Session could only be held with the approval of seven members of the Security Council. If seven members cannot be found to favour such an Emergency Special Session then the present rules of procedure 8 and 9 on special sessions would apply, which require fifteen days instead of twenty-four hours.

4. It seems to me that the present text of paragraph 8 of the United States draft resolution meets the objections to the language about "designated units" which I mentioned in my teletypes Nos. 17† and 18† of September 23.

5. You will recall that in our first discussions on this resolution with the British and the Americans at the end of August we all considered that the extent to which the Assembly should go at this session in passing a resolution of this kind was limited by the necessity of carrying countries like India along with us. Consequently, my feeling is that the utmost efforts should now be made to find out from the Indians what amendments in the draft resolution would be required in order to make it possible for them to support it.

6. It may be that in order to get their support for the necessary changes in the rules of procedure Part A should come out of the resolution and be made into a special resolution which would merely set forth the required revisions in the rules of procedure. Surely it is more important to get the revisions made in the rules of procedure by a substantial majority than to get them made with a blare of trumpets by a small majority.

7. If the Indians remain sticky about Part C of the resolution, you might wish to discuss with the Minister the possibility of his sending a message to Mr. Nehru through our Mission in New Delhi. It is hard for us here to comprehend what the nature of the Indian objections to Part C would be.

8. There is one comment which I made on paragraph 8 in my previous telegram setting forth some drafting points which is more than a drafting point. This is the use in paragraph 8 of the term "upon call by the Security Council". The word "call" is a term of art in the Charter and is never used except in a mandatory sense. If it is retained in paragraph 8 it will undoubtedly give rise to misunderstandings. Already these misunderstandings exist. Thus the Winnipeg Free Press in its editorial of September 28 said: "It must be clearly understood that Mr. Acheson's proposal is for a mandatory United Nations force. The member nations would commit their forces in advance to United Nations service and the force would be sent into action by order of the U.N. and without prior permission from the member nations".

8. My understanding is that neither we nor the Americans are proposing that national units will be sent into action by order of the United Nations and without prior permission from the member nation concerned. It is therefore I suggest important that paragraph 8 be amended to conclude in some such way as "upon recommendation by the Security Council or by the General Assembly".

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Reference previous correspondence, United States draft resolution regarding "Uniting For Peace".

1. An informal meeting took place at 9:30 p.m., 3rd October, in the offices of the United States delegation to consider their latest draft resolution on this subject (our teletype No. 41 of 29th September†). Present were representatives from Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Lebanon, Turkey and the United Kingdom. Dulles acted as Chairman. Ritchie and Carter attended for us.

2. As the meeting developed, it became clear that the Western European states still have serious reservations regarding parts A and C of the United States draft resolution. Throughout the meeting the representatives of these delegations made clear their misgivings that these sections of the resolution tended to go too far in transferring to the General Assembly the functions of the Security Council. It is now clear that there is a strong division of opinion between the United States, on the one hand, and the Western European States on the other, regarding the scope of the resolution. The United States delegation, as you know, wish to draft the resolution in a manner which will make it clear that the failure of the Security Council to act in case of aggression shall not prevent the Assembly from taking effective action. The Western European States, on the other hand, while prepared to accept Part B of the resolution regarding the Peace Observation Commission, wish to play down the idea of the General Assembly assuming, even in an emergency, the functions assigned to the Security Council. This division of opinion ran as an undercurrent through the discussion on points of detail at the meeting on 3rd October. The middle eastern representatives seemed generally inclined to agree with the cautious position expressed by the Western European representatives; and it appears evident that real support for this United States draft resolution is not so widespread as appeared to be the case, judging from the statements made in the general debate in the Assembly.

3. There was no discussion of the preamble. Regarding Part A of the resolution, the Belgian representative, Nisot, said his delegation did not like the first phrase in paragraph 1, as they did not wish to make it so explicit that the summoning of special emergency sessions of the Assembly would be due to the failure of the Council to exercise its functions. On this point, however, the United States delegation showed no inclination to compromise. The phrase in this sentence "with respect to a breach of the peace" was criticized by the United Kingdom delegation as implying a judgment of fact which could not have been validly made at the stage when a special session of the Assembly was called. It seemed to be agreed that it would be preferable to use broader language such as "with respect to a threat to the peace". In regard to the last sentence in paragraph 1, Ritchie raised the point contained in our teletype No. 40 regarding the deletion of the provision by which the General Assembly could meet in emergency special session on the call of a majority of members of the United Nations. As you know, the new United States' text refers only to the General Assembly being called at the request of any seven members of the Security Council. Ritchie pointed out that we had misgivings as to whether the dropping of the former provision might not be contrary to the provisions of Article 20 of the Charter, which specifically refers to special sessions of the Assembly being convoked at the request of a majority of the members. In reply to this Dulles said that his delegation did not share our misgivings and considered that the "special session" referred to in Article 20 was a different matter than the "special emergency session" envisaged by the present resolution. In other words, his argument appeared to be that this concept of a special emergency session was a new idea which had not been contemplated when the Charter was drafted and that, in view of this the Assembly itself could decide in what manner such a session could be called.

4. Part B of the draft resolution caused little discussion and it is clear that this is the most generally acceptable portion of the resolution. So far as paragraph 3 was concerned, however, it seemed to be agreed that some language should be added that would make it clear that the General Assembly and the Security Council must act in accordance with the functions and powers assigned them in the Charter, when sending out the peace observation commission. By adding such language, it would be implicit that the Assembly and the Council could not arbitrarily send the commission to a state which had not consented to receive the commission.

5. In regard to paragraph 8 of Part C, Nisot pointed out that the words "upon the call of the Security Council" had a very specific meaning in the Charter and implied the conclusion of special agreements under Article 43. He argued that, in the absence of such special agreements under Article 43, the use of these words would cause legal difficulties. On this point Dulles expressed his delegation's view that Article 25 of the Charter made clear the obligation of states to give assistance on the call of the Security Council even if special agreements had not been entered into under Article 43. However, he did not oppose deleting the words "upon call" and our understanding is that the resolution will now refer only to a recommendation by the Security Council or by the General Assembly.

6. In regard to paragraph 8 Dulles also made one other important proposal. He referred to the position of states who had entered into regional agreements under Chapter VIII of the Charter and said that it was not the intention of the United States delegation to have paragraph 8 drafted in a way which would inhibit the rights possessed by every member to take individual or collective measures for self-defence. In this connection Dulles referred specifically to the position of states which were members of the North Atlantic Treaty. Accordingly, he suggested that an additional sentence be added to paragraph 8 to make clear that the United Nations units to be established by member states would also be available for individual or collective self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter. Bancroft remarked that such a provision would meet the case of the Canadian Special Force. This proposal was generally supported.

7. In regard to paragraph 9, both the Western European and the Middle Eastern representatives expressed serious misgivings about the role of the Military Adviser. In answer to a question, Dulles made it clear that it was not the intention of the United States that there would be any compulsion on member States to accept this officer's advice, but rather that he would be a sort of "information center" who could supply advice upon request. Both the United Kingdom and French representatives indicated that they did not really see the need for such an adviser and that, despite Dulles' reassurances, they had misgivings about his functions. They suggested an alternative procedure by which each member of the "Collective Measures Committee" would appoint a national military adviser and thus form a Sub-Committee of military experts who could examine the more technical military details of the studies envisaged in paragraph 10. The United States delegation, however, did not show any inclination to accept this proposal.

8. The phrase "by special agreement or otherwise" in paragraph 10 was also discussed in some detail. Several representatives pointed out that the term "special agreement" had very specific connotations under Article 43 and that it would be preferable to delete the word "special". The United Kingdom representative also opposed the enumeration of categories of study as given in paragraph 10 and said that his delegation would prefer to have the paragraph drafted in a way which would not particularize these studies — i.e., by deleting all the words after "principles of the Charter". He stressed that, in any case, the United Kingdom considered the language of paragraph 10(a) much too broad. On this point Ritchie said we regretted that the former provision regarding the study of the "early establishment of a United Nations police division of volunteers" had now been deleted. He said that we still considered that this was one of the subjects which should be studied by the Collective Measures Committee. Dulles said he personally agreed with us on this point, despite the point of view of the United States military authorities that such an "international legion" was impractical. The United Kingdom and French representatives emphasized that their military authorities did not consider the idea of an "International Legion" as being practicable and would not welcome having it particularized as a special study to be undertaken by the Collective Measures Committee. Regarding paragraph 10, there was no firm decision on the various points raised, although it seemed to be generally agreed that the proposed Collective Measures Committee should have some latitude in the studies to be undertaken. Cohen of the United States delegation suggested that one alternative might be to redraft the paragraph in a way which would not particularize the studies but which would call on the Collective Measures Committee to study and report "on means, including the use of armed force, which are available or which might be made available, by agreement or otherwise, to the United Nations ...".

9. Speaking generally on Part C, the French representative said that his delegation still had misgivings regarding the whole section and that they were not yet convinced of the desirability of establishing the proposed Committee or of appointing a military adviser. He indicated that such a Committee would have too much the appearance of a Military Staff Committee and that it was premature at this stage to adopt a practice which might have the effect of giving the USSR an argument for stating that the western democracies were trying to turn the Assembly into an anti-Communist military alliance. Dulles intervened to say that the United States delegation did not consider that for the next year this Committee would do anything more than study the questions assigned to it by the Assembly, and they did not regard it as in any sense a Military Staff Committee. The Western European representatives appeared to be somewhat reassured by this statement but it seems evident that this part of the resolution will be the most difficult for them to accept.

10. Before the meeting adjourned it was agreed that a further meeting should be held to consider the resolution and that, meanwhile, the United States resolution would prepare a new draft on the basis of the discussion. I shall send you the text of this redraft as soon as available.

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Your teletype No. 59 of October 4, United States draft resolution "Uniting for Peace".

1. In view of the serious reservations which many States appear to have to Part A of the resolution, it seems to us that a strong argument can be made for deleting Part A from the resolution and substituting for it a separate resolution moving the necessary revisions in the rules of procedure of the Assembly. Such a resolution need have no preamble. The absence of a preamble might make the resolution less provocative in form.

2. We note from your teletype that the Belgian representative in the discussions did not wish to make it so explicit that the summoning of a special emergency session would be due to the failure of the Council to exercise its functions. Might it not be possible to meet the Belgian point by merely inserting in the rules of procedure provisions for calling an emergency session without setting forth any criteria which should govern the calling? The argument for this might be that it must be assumed that a majority of the Members of the United Nations including seven members of the Security Council would not concur in the calling of an emergency session unless there was good reason for the holding of such a session.

3. Under the present rules of procedure, the Security Council is empowered to summon a special session. It would look somewhat strange if the Security Council were not also given the power to summon an emergency session even though it is unrealistic to expect that all the five permanent members would favour the summoning of such an emergency session.

4. In order to assist you in your discussions of this question, we are sending you in the immediately following teletype† a draft of a resolution revising the rules of procedure. This resolution would replace Part A of the United States draft resolution.

Following for Reid from Riddell, Begins: My immediately following teletype contains draft of United States resolution on "Uniting for Peace" in its current form. Present text does not, as I had previously assumed, exclude possibility of assembly being summoned within twenty-four hours by a majority of members. Mention of this provision has been omitted from body of the resolution, but is contained in the Annex. TELEGRAM 82 New York, October 7, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

My immediately preceding teletype. Following is draft of United States resolution on "Uniting for Peace" in its current form. Text Begins:

"The General Assembly

Recognizing that the first purpose of the United Nations is 'to maintain international peace and security, and to that end to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about by peaceful means, and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace,'

Finding that international tension exists on a dangerous scale;

Recalling its Resolution 290 (IV) entitled "Essentials of Peace", and desiring to contribute further to the objectives of that resolution;

Reaffirming the importance of the exercise by the Security Council of its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and the duty of the permanent members to seek unanimity and to exercise restraint in the use of the veto;

Reaffirming the importance of the initiative of the Security Council in negotiating the agreements for armed forces provided for in Article 43 of the Charter;

Conscious that failure of the Security Council to discharge its responsibility on behalf of all the member states does not relieve member states of their obligations or the United Nations of its responsibility under the Charter to maintain international peace and security;

Recognizing in particular that such failure does not deprive the General Assembly of its rights, or relieve it of its responsibilities, under Chapter IV of the Charter in regard to the maintenance of international peace and security;

Recognizing that discharge by the General Assembly of its responsibilities in these respects calls for possibilities of observation which would ascertain the facts and expose aggressors; for the existence of armed forces which would be used collectively, and for the possibility of timely recommendations by the General Assembly to United Nations members for collective action which, to be effective, should be prompt.

A

1. Resolves that if the Security Council, because of lack of unanimity of the permanent members, fails to exercise its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security in any case where there appears to be a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression, the General Assembly shall consider the matter immediately with a view to making appropriate recommendations to members for collective action, including when necessary the use of armed force, to maintain or restore international peace and security. If not in session at the time, the General Assembly may meet in emergency special session within twenty-four hours of the request therefor. Such emergency special session shall be called if requested by any seven members of the Security Council.

2. Adopts for this purpose the revisions in its rules of procedure set forth in the annex to this resolution.

B

3. Establishes a Peace Observation Commission which for the calendar years 1951 and 1952 shall be composed of (9-14 members) and which could observe and report on the situation in any area where there exists international tension, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. Upon the invitation or with the consent of the state into whose territory the Commission would go, the General Assembly or the Interim Committee when the General Assembly is not in session may utilize the Commission if the Security Council is not exercising the functions assigned to it by the Charter with respect to the matter in question. Decisions to utilize the Commission shall be made upon the vote of a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting. The Security Council may also utilize the Commission in accordance with its authority under the Charter.

4. The Commission shall have authority in its discretion to appoint sub-commissions and to utilize the services of observers to assist it in the performance of its functions.

5. Recommends to all Governments and authorities that they cooperate with the Commission and assist it in the performance of its functions.

6. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the necessary staff and facilities utilizing where directed by the Commission the United Nations panel of field observers envisaged in Resolution 297 (IV) B.

7. Invites each member of the United Nations to survey its resources in order to determine the nature and scope of the assistance it may be in a position to render in support of any United Nations measures for the restoration of international peace and security.

8. Recommends to the members of the United Nations that each member maintain within its national armed forces elements so trained that they could promptly be made available for service as a United Nations unit or units, upon recommendation by the Security Council or General Assembly, without prejudice to the use of such elements in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defence recognized in Article 51 of the Charter.

9. Requests the Secretary General of the United Nations to appoint, with the approval of the Committee provided for in paragraph 10, a panel of military experts, to be available to be drawn upon by member states which wish to obtain technical advice regarding the organization, training and equipment for prompt service as United Nations units of the elements referred to in paragraph 8.

D

10. Establishes a Collective Measures Committee consisting of representatives of (10-14 members) and directs the Committee, in consultation with the Secretary General to study and report to the Security Council and the General Assembly, not later than September 1st, 1951, on the methods and resources, including armed force, which are available or which might be made available to the United Nations in order to maintain international peace and security in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter, taking account of collective self-defence and regional arrangements (Articles 51 and 52 of the Charter).

11. Requests the Secretary General to furnish the staff and facilities necessary for the effective accomplishment of the purposes set forth in Parts C and D of this resolution.

Annex for Resolution "Uniting for Peace"

The rules of procedure of the General Assembly are amended in the following respects:

1. The present text of Rule 8 shall become paragraph A of that rule, and a new paragraph B shall be added to read as follows:

"Emergency special sessions shall be convened within twenty-four hours of the receipt by the Secretary-General of a request for such a session from the Security Council or any seven members thereof, or of a request from a majority of the members of the United Nations expressed by vote in the Interim Committee or otherwise, or of the concurrence of a majority of members as provided in Rule 9."

2. The present text of Rule 9 shall become paragraph A of that rule and a new paragraph B shall be added to read as follows:

"This rule shall apply also to a request by any member for an emergency special session. In such a case the Secretary-General shall communicate with other members by the most expeditious means of communication available."

3. Rule 10 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"In the case of an emergency special session convened pursuant to Rule 8-B, the Secretary-General shall notify the members of the United Nations at least twelve hours in advance of the opening of the session."

4. Rule 16 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"The provisional agenda of an emergency special session shall be communicated to the members of the United Nations simultaneously with the communication summoning the session."

5. Rule 19 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"During an emergency special session additional items may be added to the agenda by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting."

6. There is added a new rule to precede Rule 65 to read as follows:

"Notwithstanding the provisions of any other rule, in case of an emergency special session the Assembly shall convene in plenary session and proceed directly to consider the item proposed for consideration in the request for the holding of the session, without previous reference to the General Committee or to any other committee unless the General Assembly decides otherwise." Text Ends.

TELEGRAM 130 New York, October 12, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

My telegram No. 115†: United Action for Peace.

As you will have noted from the teleprinter summary of yesterday's debate on this item, in which the representatives of thirteen nations took part, no new fundamental points of substance were brought out. All delegates that have spoken in the debate to date, save those of the Soviet Bloc and India (which has "reserved" its "final judgment") have expressed their approval in principle of the joint resolution. The Chilean resolution has not commanded any particular attention even from among Latin-American delegations.

2. It has been noticeable particularly in the statements made yesterday that the legal problems raised by the joint resolution have been relegated to a second place and it is more on political grounds that the delegations are taking their positions. Some delegations, such as New Zealand, would prefer to see the resolution go further but as Mr. Doidge put it, under present circumstances it would have to be accepted as the best and the most that can be achieved. Other delegations such as Syria and Pakistan, while approving the resolution in principle, expressed concern as to the legality of certain sections particularly Section A vis-à-vis the Charter. India and Ecuador inter alia expressed a desire to see certain phrases clarified, and spelled out in greater detail for the sake of precision and to avoid ambiguity of meaning. The details of these points will be available to you in the teleprinter summary and need not be mentioned in this telegram.

3. The Soviet Union has introduced two proposals. The first calls upon the General Assembly to recommend to the Security Council "that it should take the necessary steps to insure that the taking of the action provided by the Charter in case any threat to the peace or act of aggression is declared and to secure the peaceful settlement of disputes or situations likely to threaten the maintenance of international peace and security." The resolution further asks the Assembly to recommend to the Security Council that the Council should decide on measures to secure the rapid application of Articles 43, 45, 46 and 47 of the Charter relating to the placing of armed forces at the disposal of the Security Council by member States of the United Nations and to the effective operation of the Military Staff Committee. The second Soviet proposal asks the Assembly to recommend that, before armed forces are placed at the disposal of the Security Council under Article 43 of the Charter, the five permanent members of the Council should, under Article 106 of the Charter, consult together "for the purpose of taking such joint action on behalf of the Organization as may prove to be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security." These resolutions are being forwarded to you by bag. Our first reaction is that no objection can be taken to that but I should be grateful for your comments. Lebanon and Egypt have also introduced amendments and they too are going forward by bag.

4. On the procedural side, two or three delegations have expressed the view that all the resolutions put forward together with amendments which have been or may be submitted should be referred to a sub-committee. The main reason put forward in this connection is that no hasty action should be taken on such an important matter without thorough consideration of all aspects, legal and political. Syria has even asked that a final decision be postponed for two or three weeks. It is conceivable if these resolutions and amendments go to a sub-committee, as they likely will, that because of the fundamental legal considerations involved, the effort to reach harmony or compromise would be a lengthy and arduous process. It has become only too apparent in this debate that like the Bible the Charter can be quoted and interpreted to suit any point of view.

5. We are, nevertheless, inclined to the view that such a sub-committee would serve a useful purpose and would provide for a more orderly discussion of the proposals put forward.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON "UNITED ACTION FOR PEACE"

1. On conclusion of general debate on draft resolution, sponsoring Powers met to consider the various amendments which had been proposed, and further debate in the Committee on the details of the resolution was postponed until Monday.

2. My immediately following teletype† contains text of revised draft resolution which will be placed before Committee by sponsoring Powers on Monday morning.

3. Preamble has been revised to include references to procedures for peaceful settlement of disputes, as suggested by a number of delegations.

4. Paragraph 1 has been revised so that recommendations by General Assembly for collective action may be made only in case of breach of the peace or act of aggression, and not in the case of threat to the peace.

5. Paragraph 1 has been revised further so that special emergency session is now to be called by the Security Council on a procedural vote, or by a majority of members of the United Nations.

6. In the course of discussion on this topic Dulles argued in favour of original text by saying on the one hand that provision for summoning of a special session by seven members of Security Council was simply a delegation of the authority now held by a majority of members, and on the other hand that what was intended was to establish a procedural vote in the Security Council. He finally decided that it was the latter which he really intended, and the paragraph was reworded accordingly.

7. Paragraph 8 of the resolution has been amended to include the word "equipped" in referring to elements of national armed forces. The words "in accordance with their respective constitutional processes" have also been added.

8. A new paragraph 9 has been added, calling upon member States to give information about the action they are taking under paragraph 8.

9. Paragraph 11 in its present form is a revision which I worked out in consultation with Mr. Spender, to meet his objections to the original wording. It was his view that the text as originally drafted gave the Collective Measures Committee too much authority to enquire into internal affairs of member States.

10. A new paragraph 12 has been added, calling on member States to cooperate with the Collective Measures Committee.

11. We have some doubt, which is shared by other delegations, whether paragraphs 10 and 11, as they now stand, are satisfactory. In both cases, they represent vestiges of more far-reaching provisions included in earlier drafts. It was therefore suggested that the two paragraphs might be revised and included within the paragraph establishing the Collective Measures Committee. At the request of the group, I have prepared a redraft of these two paragraphs, which I am submitting to them for their consideration. Text of this redraft is given in a subsequent teletype.

12. Section E has been added at the request of the Chilean delegation, which, in return for this amendment, will withdraw its competitive resolution.

13. Annex containing revisions in rules of procedure has not been included with draft resolution in my immediately following teletype.†

TELEGRAM 153 New York, October 14, 1950

Following is text of proposed redraft of paragraphs 10 and 11 of draft resolution on "United Action For Peace". Text Begins:

Establishes a Collective Measures Committee consisting of five members and directs this Committee, in consultation with the Secretary-General, and with member States as the Committee finds appropriate, to:

(a) Arrange on the request of any member State for the provision of appropriate technical advice regarding the organization, training and equipment for prompt service as United Nations' units of the elements referred to in paragraph 8.

(b) Study methods, including those of paragraph C of this resolution, which might be used to maintain and strengthen international peace and security in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter taking account of collective self-defence and regional arrangements (Articles 51 and 52 of the Charter).

(c) Report to the Security Council and the General Assembly not later than September 1, 1951. Text Ends.

RESTRICTED

UNITED ACTION FOR PEACE

1. Although the First Committee completed its detailed discussion of Part A of the joint seven-nation resolution yesterday morning, it was agreed by a vote of twenty-five to nineteen, with thirteen abstentions, to adopt a suggestion from Iraq that voting on this section be postponed to give delegations an opportunity to obtain final instructions. South Africa had also indicated that although supporting the resolution, they would appreciate more time to obtain instructions. It was made clear by the Chairman that postponement of the vote did not mean that the debate could be re-opened. It was later agreed that votes on the other operative parts of the resolution (B, C, and D) would be similarly postponed.

2. Discussion of Part B dealt mainly with the reference to the Interim Committee, which was attacked by the U.S.S.R. and considered of somewhat doubtful value by some of the other delegations. Two alternative proposals were advanced, Sweden suggesting that in authorizing the use of the Peace Observation Commission, the Secretary-General might be substituted for the Interim Committee, and China suggesting that the Commission itself might determine whether an investigation were desirable. The U.S.S.R. also returned to the proposal that the five permanent members of the Security Council should be represented on this Commission. Following a suggestion from China, the sponsors met at noon to consider the possibility of redrafting Part B, but it was agreed by a majority of the sponsors that the reference to the Interim Committee should be retained. It was also agreed that no decision should be taken at this time regarding the exact composition of the Peace Observation Commission.

3. Part C was also discussed, and the debate on all the operative portions should be concluded today.

4. As you know, the sponsors have been considering various amendments to the original text which might improve it or make it more acceptable to the Committee, and had adopted a number of changes which were incorporated in the revised draft forwarded under my teletype No. 152 of October 14th.† These changes have helped resolve the doubts which had obviously been entertained by several delegations. However, the proposed re-draft of paragraphs 10 and 11, which would have appeared under Part D as a new paragraph 10 and which was quoted in my teletype No. 153 of October 14th, has been dropped, since the United States are unwilling to accept as extensive changes as this would entail.

5. At the end of Monday's meeting Dulles suggested casually to Vishinsky that it he really were serious about wanting to discuss the issues involved in the joint resolution, Dulles was ready to do so at any time. He received a message from Vishinsky yesterday morning requesting an interview. Dulles reported on this conversation at the sponsors' meeting. He had pointed out to Vishinsky that while he was willing to "wrap this package up in any kind of paper and string" that might be acceptable to all concerned, the package itself must contain the four essential provisions for special armed units, the summoning of special emergency sessions of the General Assembly and the establishment of the Peace Observation Commission and Collective Measures Committee. The conversation ended without any concrete results, as there was no indication that the U.S.S.R. could alter their position on these points.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

At meeting of the seven sponsor Powers of the "uniting for peace" resolution yesterday, Mr. Dulles gave an account of a further interview he had had with Vishinsky yesterday morning. Vishinsky had told him that the USSR wished to serve on the Peace Observation Commission contemplated in the resolution, and would be willing to do so even if the clause referring to the power of the Interim Committee to utilize the Commission (to which Soviet delegation had taken exception) was retained in the final text of the resolution. Vishinsky said to Dulles that this marked the beginning of a new era of cooperation between Soviet Union and other Powers. At the end of the conversation Vishinsky had remarked, half jokingly, that of course the Soviet Union would want "their China" on the Commission, whereas the United States would want "their China".

2. Dulles asked the meeting their views as to inclusion of Soviet Union and other permanent members of the Security Council on the Commission. It was generally agreed that if the Soviet Union was willing to serve, it would not be possible to keep her off the Commission. We suggested that the question of China might prove to be the crux of the matter, as if Vishinsky stood out for inclusion of Communist China, this would reopen that whole question. Dulles observed that he certainly would not be in favour of including Soviet Union if Soviet Government simply intended to use its membership on the new Commission as an excuse for raising the question of Communist China at every turn in the Commission's work. He proposed to have a further conversation with Vishinsky, yesterday or this morning, to obtain a further clarification of the Soviet view regarding China.

3. We then raised a suggestion we had advanced at last sponsors' meeting that permanent members might be included on the Commission by a normal process of election as countries (e.g. in the same fashion as they are elected for the Economic and Social Council), and not ex officio as permanent members of the Security Council. The United States delegation stated that they saw considerable advantage in this suggestion. Dulles thought that the method of election would be more attractive to the Assembly than the inclusion of the permanent members as such in the Commission. There was a tendency on the part of the sponsors to agree with this view, although France and the United Kingdom seemed hesitant about it. Of course there may be objection on the part of the Soviet Union to this suggestion, as they may favour the inclusion of the five permanent members as such.

4. Very tentative lists of members for this Observation Commission and the Collective Measures Committee have been drawn up by the United States delegation, and we and other delegations have been giving thought to this matter, which will be further discussed at a meeting of the sponsors today. Canada will certainly be expected to serve on the Collective Measures Committee. It is obviously desirable to bring India in, either on the Peace Observation Commission or the Collective Measures Committee. While the latter would be desirable, it is more likely that India would consent to serve on the former. Pakistan has stated its desire to serve on both bodies. Vishinsky has indicated that in addition to the Soviet Union, either Czechoslovakia or Poland should be included in the Peace Observation Commission.

UNITED NATIONS: POLITICAL COMMITTEE — "UNITED ACTION FOR PEACE"

Mr. Holmes. On Saturday, October 21, the Political Committee concluded its two week debate on "United Action for Peace". Two main decisions were taken and will now be forwarded to a plenary meeting of the Assembly for final adoption.

1. The resolution put forward by the United States and six co-sponsors, including Canada, and which has been discussed in some detail at earlier meetings, was approved by the Committee by a vote of 50 in favour, 5 against (the Soviet bloc), and 3 abstentions (India, Argentina and Syria).[37] The Indian Delegate explained his abstention on the ground that "the practical benefits likely to accrue from part C (earmarking of national forces for U.N. use) ... are dubious". He implied that this part of the resolution was untimely in that it created the impression that the United Nations was "busy perfecting its machinery for the use of armed force instead of concentrating on the promotion of peace and goodwill".

Although the U.S.S.R. voted against the seven-power plan, it accepted membership in one of the two special bodies established under the resolution — the Peace Observation Commission. The other thirteen members of the Commission are: China, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, France, India, Iraq, Israel, New Zealand, Pakistan, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States, and Uruguay.

Canada was among the fourteen members appointed to the other body set up under the resolution — the Collective Measures Committee. The full composition of this Committee is to be as follows: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Egypt, France, Mexico, the Philippines, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States, Venezuela and Yugoslavia.

2. Among the numerous amendments submitted to the "United Action for Peace" resolution was a proposal by Iraq and Syria that direct consultations among the five permanent members of the Security Council be renewed. This proposal received virtually unanimous approval in the Political Committee, although it set off another wrangle over Chinese Representation in which a new Soviet attempt to have the Chinese Communists recognized was defeated. Under the resolution the five powers will be asked "to meet and discuss collectively or otherwise and, if necessary, with other states concerned, all problems which are likely to threaten international peace ... with a view to their resolving fundamental differences and reaching agreement in accordance with the letter and spirit of the Charter".

The Canadian Delegation has expressed the view that it is unlikely that the talks among the five powers will lead to positive results.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au secrétaire d'État des États-Unis

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State of United States

SECRET AND PERSONAL Ottawa, August 15, 1950

Dear Dean [Acheson],

I think that you know how much Norman [Robertson] and I appreciated the talk we had with you a short time ago about Korea and other matters.[38] It was good of you to give us so much time when you were harassed with so many pressing matters.

In the light of recent developments I have been thinking over what we said that night about Formosa and the Chinese Communists, and I should like to put before you some of the apprehensions which I still have over this question. I do so in a personal letter, because it is easier to "get things off one's chest" this way. It will also be easier for you in reply (if you care to reply) to tell me I am off the beam and to stop bothering you!

It has, of course, been explained that the United States' action in regard to Formosa was taken with a view to preventing the extension of the Korean conflict; you put that case to us very impressively at our recent meeting. There appears to be a real danger, however, (or so it seems to me), that, instead of having hostilities confined to Korea where support — of one kind or another — for the action taken by the United Nations has been forthcoming from virtually all non-Communist members, the area of conflict may, in fact, be widened to include China. What is worse, it may be widened in such a way as to involve the United Nations, yet not command the same measure of support from its members.

I wonder whether the possibility of an early attack on Formosa has not been increased by the preventive military measures being taken by the National Government of China against Communist concentrations along the mainland invasion coast, while Formosa itself is "neutralized"; as well as by statements reported to have been made by Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, following General MacArthur's recent visit, concerning United States-Chinese "military cooperation" and "the joint defence of Formosa". That visit, incidentally, was made by one who is a United Nations as well as a United States Commander. Who is suffering from schizophrenia?

[38] Voir le document 62./See Document 62.

Military conflict between the forces of the United States and Communist China, which could hardly be restricted to the Straits of Formosa, would be a disaster from which only the Soviet Union would profit. Such a conflict would create grave difficulties for members of the United Nations, and at the time they are becoming more keenly aware, as a result of the Korean aggression, of the menace of Soviet imperialism and of the use by this imperialism of Communist parties abroad. I am aware that the United States Government has assumed on its own the responsibility for the defence of Formosa. Nevertheless, the involvement of other friendly nations is, in reality, implicit in this action. If United States warships, for example, were to become engaged against Communist Chinese vessels, or if it were considered necessary, during the course of operations, for United States aircraft to bomb Chinese bases on the mainland, the sure result would be a charge of aggression in the Security Council brought against the United States by the Soviet Union. This would confuse the issues of Korea and Formosa, as a consequence of which some nations would be under considerable embarrassment as to how to state their positions in public. The threat of Chinese Communist retaliation against territories such as Hong Kong and Indo-China would be always present; and, to judge from attitudes previously taken, the cooperation between Asian and non-Asian members of the United Nations might be seriously — even disastrously — affected. If these things were to happen, then a disruptive element would be introduced at the very time when an encouraging measure of unity has been achieved in the decision to repel aggression in Korea.

It seems to me that of the other unfortunate results of an armed clash between the United States and Communist China over Formosa, the most important are these: the draining of resources which are now urgently needed elsewhere; a lessening of the possibility of the latent tensions which exist between Communist China and Soviet imperialism becoming active; increasing danger of the involvement of Communist China in the Korean conflict.

If a collision with Communist China over Formosa is threatening, what can be done to avoid it? Clarifying statements such as that which President Truman made on July 19th are very helpful.[39] In the present circumstances, however, I doubt whether the President's statement went far enough to give the Chinese Communists any face-saving way out of an early attack upon Formosa, to which they have been publicly committed for a long time; or to remove completely the fears of other countries that Korea and Formosa are part of a single American policy.

Might there not be some advantage in an early consultation among the principally interested Western powers, in an effort to reach agreement on ways of reducing friction between themselves and Communist China; or at the least, on tactics which would make it clear who would be to blame for the resulting fire? Consideration should first be given, I believe, to possible ways of dissuading the Chinese Communists from attacking Formosa during the Korean operations. Perhaps a move in this direction might be taken by some public assurance that the military strength of the National Government forces will not be increased by outside aid during this period beyond the minimum strictly required for defence of the island, and that the mainland Chinese will have an appropriate voice in the peaceful determination of the future status of Formosa.

You may reply that the only effective way to prevent an attack on Formosa is to convince the Chinese Communists that if they do attack they will be defeated and destroyed. Is it not pretty certain, however, that an attack — whether doomed or not — is exactly what Moscow, and the extremists in Peking, want, and are we not playing into their hands if we give them any unnecessary excuse for it? Maybe I'm wrong in this, but I'm right surely in thinking that the political results of armed conflict between the United States and Communist China would be disastrous.

There is, of course, another aspect to this problem, namely, Chinese representation on the Security Council. It is too bad that at this moment Chiang's delegate should be representing China there. That, of course, also plays into the hands of the Soviet. If, as I believe, the Soviet leaders would welcome the involvement of the United States in war with China, if this, in fact, is one of the present major aims of Soviet policy, then the Soviet Government, while posing as Peking's champion, may really wish to keep Communist China away from the Security Council in order, not only to isolate China from anything in the nature of normal relations with the Western world, but also to be able to present the United States to the Asians as the villain of the piece. In this case, the seating of Communist China in the Security Council might contribute to the upsetting of Soviet calculations. You will probably reply that it might contribute also to the upsetting of Mr. Acheson!

I realize, of course, that in attempting to formulate any policy designed to bring about an easing of relations with Communist China, all of us would have difficulty with some sections of our public opinion and that, in this respect (to put it mildly), there is a special problem in the United States. If, however, we could come to some general agreement on a course of action in this regard, it would be easier for us to meet public opinion. May I commend to your attention in this connection — if you have not already seen it — the leading article in the current Economist, "Mr. Malik's Manoeuvres".

If I venture to write you so frankly and at such length on this subject, it is only because of my worry over the danger of the present Chinese situation weakening, and indeed even breaking, the unity which we should show against Soviet Communism. That worry has been increased by the new confidence and assertiveness of Chiang Kai-shek and his people, resulting, at least in part, from General MacArthur's visit, as well as by the strident efforts of the Luce-Hearst-McCormick axis to bring about open, armed conflict between the United States and Communist China. In that conflict, a great many of the United Nations would do their very best to stand aloof. That division, I'm afraid, would then reflect itself in fields other than China. There could hardly be anything worse than this. Possibly, once again, our enemies will save us from it!

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

FORMOSA

Mr. Menzies referred to the Formosan question which has come before the United Nations as a result of a Chinese Communist complaint arising from the United States' action in assuming responsibility for the island's defence during the present crisis.

A cablegram was received by the Security Council from the Foreign Minister of The People's Republic of China accusing the United States Government of open encroachment on the territory of China and of direct armed aggression, together with a "total violation of the United Nations Charter" with regard to Formosa. The cablegram went on to ask the Security Council to condemn the United States Government for its "criminal" act, and to take immediate measures so as to bring about "the complete withdrawal of all United States armed invading forces from Taiwan (Formosa) and from other territories belonging to China". In a letter to the Secretary-General, Senator Austin stated that the United States had not encroached on the territory of China, nor had it taken aggressive action against China. The action which the United States had taken with regard to Formosa was an impartial neutralizing action addressed both to the forces on Formosa and to those on the mainland. As President Truman had solemnly declared, the United States had no designs on Formosa, and would therefore welcome the United Nations consideration of the case. It would also approve a "full United Nations investigation here or on the spot".

In view of this letter, the Security Council voted to include a new item on its agenda, which was entitled "Complaint of armed invasion of the Island of Taiwan (Formosa)". Mr. Malik then proposed that a representative of The People's Republic of China be invited to attend meetings of the Security Council during the consideration of the new item as the complainant in the case. Although the Soviet proposal was defeated at the time, Mr. Malik reserved the right of his delegation to re-introduce this proposal when the Council began consideration of the Formosa item.

Mr. Menzies said it was possible that discussion in the United Nations of Communist China's charges against the United States would resuscitate the dormant item of Nationalist China's charges against Soviet Russia for violation of the United Nations Charter and of the Sino-Soviet Treaty of 1945.

Concerning the expression "other territories belonging to China" used in the Communist China Foreign Minister's telegram to the Secretary-General, he thought that this might refer to the Ryukyu island chain in which Okinawa lies. On the other hand, it might refer to those islands lying along the Chinese coast which remain in Nationalist hands.

He also suggested the possibility that the Chinese Communists may be reluctant to intervene in Korea while their complaint on Formosa is before the Security Council. (Confidential)

Le secrétaire d'État des États Unis
au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Secretary of State of United States

SECRET AND PERSONAL Washington, September 8, 1950

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

I am most grateful for your letter of August 15, 1950 and welcome the spirit of complete frankness with which you discussed problems relating to China. Since reading your letter I have been turning over in my mind your comments and the thoughts which they provoke. I shall not attempt to comment individually on the points which you have raised; rather I shall attempt to give you a somewhat fuller outline of our thinking on the general problem than was possible when you were here.

Let me state at the outset that we are very much aware of the dangers inherent in our position respecting Formosa and of the desirability of finding some formula which, without disregarding essential security elements, would lessen the misgivings of our friends. I have already had a preliminary exchange of views with Mr. Bevin through Oliver Franks and I expect that considerable attention will be given to this problem in discussions with Mr. Bevin and Mr. Schuman before the meeting of the General Assembly.

The President's statements of June 27 and July 19 and his letter to Ambassador Austin of August 27 remain firm lines of United States policy respecting Formosa during the present crisis.[40] I am sure that you will understand this although, unfortunately, others less well acquainted with the United States may have found recent developments somewhat confusing.

In taking the measures outlined by the President in his statement of June 27, the United States sought to neutralize Formosa militarily during the present threat to the peace of the West Pacific. It has carefully stated that these measures were taken without prejudice to the question of the long-term political status of the Island. We believe that this question should be settled by peaceful negotiation. Our measures to bring about the military neutralization of Formosa, far from being directed toward a forcible solution of the question, operate, in fact, to prevent a solution by force and to permit a settlement by negotiation. Our willingness to have the Security Council take up the question of Formosa should, I think, provide convincing evidence of this.

In stationing our naval forces in the vicinity of Formosa, we of course accepted a calculated risk that our forces might become involved in active hostilities with Chinese Communist forces. We accepted this risk to avoid what we judged to be the greater risk of leaving Southeastern Asia open to Communist military aggression and permitting a dangerous, hostile flank to be opened at a time when available United States and other friendly forces were, under the auspices of the United Nations, heavily engaged in containing and throwing back the Communist aggression in Korea.

We have sought to minimize the risk of active hostilities with Chinese Communist forces by introducing the concept of neutralization of Formosa. In accordance with this concept the Seventh Fleet was directed to assure the cessation of air and naval operations by Chinese Nationalist forces on Formosa against the mainland as well as to prevent attack upon the Island. We had hoped that by making clear that the measures taken by us were for the purpose of neutralization, and that those measures were undertaken without prejudice to the long-term political status of Formosa, a truce in the Formosa fighting might be enforced with minimum danger of a Chinese Communist attack on U.S. forces.

These measures were not motivated by a desire to support any Chinese political group. As you know, there were much broader considerations relating to security in the Western Pacific and bearing directly upon a successful conclusion of the Security Council's aims respecting Korea. Specifically, our measures should not be interpreted as a stepping-stone toward our entry into mainland China or toward the return of the Nationalist Government to the mainland with our support. We have entered into no political or military commitments with the National Government in this regard and contemplate none, although we would have to examine this question again should the Chinese Communists embark on a course of military aggression in Korea or elsewhere in Asia. We are aware of the dangers of permitting the National Government to associate the measures which we have taken with their own political cause and are constantly endeavoring to counter such moves on their part without, however, giving aid and comfort to the authorities on the mainland.

As you know, the Chinese Communists have rejected the concept of neutralization. In view of this and the heavy engagement of our forces in Korea, we are finding it necessary to consider providing a limited amount of military materiel which the Chinese forces on Formosa might need for the defense of the Island. In practice, it is often difficult to draw a clear line between defensive and offensive measures, but our aim has been to reduce the possibilities of direct hostilities between the two forces without interfering with legitimate defensive measures of the Chinese National Government on the islands they now hold.

I believe that the three immediate problems confronting us respecting Formosa are (1) finding means to dissuade a Chinese Communist attack, (2) finding a basis for wider support of the United States if such an attack is made and (3) assuring that questions affecting Formosa be settled by peaceful means. I hope our readiness to have the Chinese Communist charges against us investigated by the Security Council may contribute something to the solution of these problems. Furthermore, we have been considering the feasibility of proposing that the General Assembly appoint a commission to examine all aspects of the Formosa problem under conditions where all parties would be obligated to refrain from the use of force while the matter is under consideration. Possibly the Commission might be instructed to report back to the next General Assembly meeting. I present this thought very sketchily, because it is still sketchy in our own thinking. An obvious factor bearing upon it would be the nature and extent of action taken in the Security Council. Another would be the course of interim events in the area.

A word about the matter of Chinese representation in the UN. We cannot in good conscience alter our present opposition to seating the Chinese Communist representatives. I think you are fully aware of our reason for this. We would not wish to see the question of Chinese representation, about which there is considerable disagreement among the non-Communist countries, brought to the forefront while the Security Council is occupied with urgent matters relating to the aggression in Korea. After a solution of the Korean crisis, we should be quite willing to have the question considered on its merits. In our view, the heart of the matter is not our opposition to the Chinese Communists, but rather the fact that many members of the UN obviously have the same doubts and misgivings respecting the Peiping regime as do we and that these doubts are being confirmed by Peiping's attitude toward Korea and its other neighbors.

I am most grateful that you have given me your views on one of the most complicated problems now facing us. I hope that you will continue to let me have the benefit of your comments and suggestions.

Cordially,

DEAN [ACHESON]

FORMOSA

Mr. Menzies said that a memorandum from the United Kingdom High Commissioner had been received setting forth the United Kingdom Government's views on Formosa. On the basis of those views the United Kingdom authorities intended to consult with other interested and friendly governments in an attempt to solve the Formosa problem. The United Kingdom attitude in summary was as follows:

(1) Formosa should be regarded as "Chinese", i.e., part of the Chinese State.

(2) It is admitted that the neutralization of Formosa is a matter of strategic necessity during the present crisis, especially in view of the unfriendly attitude of the Peking Government. Genuine neutralization should be enforced, however, and Nationalist military action against the mainland should not be permitted.

(3) A formula must be found whereby United Nations support is obtained for the neutralization of Formosa in order to deter a Chinese Communist assault on the Island. To this end every effort should be made to dispel the impression that Western Powers have undertaken to defend the Chiang Kai-shek Government in Formosa.

(4) The practicability of holding a plebiscite in Formosa under United Nations trusteeship appears to be doubtful because of the present possession of the Island by Chiang Kai-shek with his considerable armed forces and because the Peking Government is not represented in the United Nations.

(5) A possible course of action which would help the present position and deal with the long-term problem to some extent might be the adoption of a Resolution by the General Assembly (to avoid a Soviet veto in the Security Council) which would

(a) Recommend that Formosa should in due course revert to China;

(b) propose that any action to this end should await the restoration of peace in the Pacific area and that in the meantime no action should be taken by anybody to disturb the status quo or use the Island as a base; and

(c) establish a Commission to recommend when the moment is appropriate for the hand-over and the conditions under which it should take place. In the United Kingdom view such a resolution would have the advantages of not abandoning the Cairo Declaration, but would enable a hand-over to be deferred until the Chinese Communists should make some signs of behaving reasonably in international affairs. It might also conceivably save the Peking Government's face sufficiently to enable it to refrain from making direct assault on Formosa.

Ultimate United States policy towards Formosa is not fixed, according to our Ambassador in Washington, and will be discussed with representatives of other friendly powers in New York. The main objectives of the United States are to see that Formosa is neutralized for the duration of the Korean conflict and that its eventual disposition is settled without resort to force. The State Department would like to have the status of Formosa settled by the United Nations and hopes that some friendly delegation might raise the question in the General Assembly in the form of a resolution appointing a Commission to report to the next Session of the Assembly and calling upon both Chinese Nationalists and Communists to take no action pending the outcome of the Commission's deliberations. It appears that the State Department no longer regards the Cairo Declaration as binding and that it hopes that responsibility for the disposition of Formosa can be handed over to the United Nations without causing a serious division among members.

The Canadian view is that in principle we adhere to the Cairo Declaration, which promised the restoration of Formosa to the Chinese State. This promise was confirmed by the Potsdam Agreement upon which the Japanese Instrument of Surrender was based and which was signed by Canada. The political wisdom of repudiating wartime undertakings is doubtful. Furthermore, the de facto administration of Formosa by the Chinese Government has been acquiesced in by the Canadian Government, through acceptance of a note from the Chinese Government in 1946 stating that Formosa was restored to Chinese sovereignty and that Formosans had regained their Chinese citizenship; through agreement that the commercial modus vivendi with China should include Formosa; and through various administrative actions. The question of possession of Formosa cannot be extracted from its Chinese civil war context and treated as a separate problem. In matters of this sort it has been Canadian policy to be prepared to make offers of good offices in order to help bring about an end to disputes but not to favour the imposition of a solution upon one side or the other. We should be ready to put forward or support any compromise proposal which might have the effect of lessening the differences between the United States and Asian countries in this matter and of reducing in consequence the likelihood of a Chinese Communist assault upon Formosa.

FORMOSA

Following from Ritchie and Riddell, Begins: Following is text of a draft resolution on Formosa prepared by the United Kingdom delegation, Begins:

Noting (a) That Formosa was Chinese territory for more than two centuries before being ceded to Japan in 1895,

(b) That the signatories to the Cairo Declaration declared their intention that Formosa should be restored to the Republic of China;

Recognizing that two parties at present claim the right to administer Formosa, that there have been threats of an armed attack on Formosa from the Chinese mainland and that Formosa has been used as a base for attacks on the Chinese mainland, and that an attempt to settle the dispute by force or the continuance of attacks on the Chinese mainland from Formosa would heighten international tension at a time when the situation in the Pacific area is already tense as a result of events in Korea;

Decides to establish a Commission which, bearing in mind China's claims as set out above, should study the problem and submit a report to the Assembly containing recommendations for the future of Formosa. The Commission should consult with all interested parties, including the Central People's Government, and should take into account the interests of the people of Formosa;

Recommends (a) That, pending consideration of the Commission's report by the General Assembly, there should be no attempt to seek a solution of the issue by force,

(b) That Formosa should not be used as a base for attacks on the Chinese mainland;

Requests all parties to render every possible assistance to the Commission in the performance of its task. Text ends.

2. We had a talk with Dening of the United Kingdom delegation who is the author of this resolution this afternoon. He said that he had shown it to the United States delegation who had been in general agreement with it but said that they had a draft of their own which they preferred. Dening said that, while the United States delegation had originally suggested that they would like the resolution on Formosa to be sponsored by some other Government they had now apparently decided to put forward their own text. Foster Dulles, who had seen the United Kingdom resolution had commented that he did not like part A of the first paragraph referring to the historical connection between Formosa and China. Dening had also shown his resolution to the Indian delegation who had not objected to it.

3. So far as the long term solution of the Formosan problem is concerned Dening said that he had had a talk with Walter Lippman just before he published his recent article on the subject advocating de-militarization and local autonomy for Formosa. Dening said that this sort of solution might ultimately be possible but that it would be difficult if not impossible for the Chinese Communist Government to accept either de-militarization or any substantial degree of Formosan autonomy at any early stage in the negotiations. It was very much of a question whether even in the long run they would be willing to accept a solution along these lines. Meanwhile the first stage was to "take the heat off" the question of Formosa by setting up a Commission to study the problem of its future.

4. We should appreciate your comments and suggestions on the resolution. Our guess is that the United States text, even if it has the same object in view, will be very differently drafted if only for reasons of acceptability to United States public opinion. We feel, however, that if the United States would be prepared to accept something along the general lines of this resolution this would be a step forward.

5. Incidentally Dening remarked that he was seeing Foster Dulles this afternoon to discuss a Japanese Peace Treaty. Ends.

Memorandum for Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [New York], October 19, 1950

FORMOSA

Attached is a copy of a "modified text" of the United Kingdom draft resolution on Formosa, with changes and additions suggested by the United States. This was given to me informally this afternoon by Allison, who had not yet had an opportunity to give it to the British — and who asked me to keep it for a day or so before sending it on to Ottawa. As a compromise I sent a copy to Menzies, by bag, under a personal note, explaining the circumstances.

2. The additions to the original text in paragraphs 1 and 4 have been underlined.[41] Paragraph 7, referring to the Security Council, is entirely new. Paragraph 5 (first recommendation) has been reworded to make it clear that its restrictive force bears equally on the Chinese Communists and Nationalists, and to tighten the original by referring to the "adoption by the Assembly of recommendations concerning the problem." For comparison, following is the United Kingdom text:

> Recommends (a) that, pending consideration of the Commission's report by the General Assembly, there should be no attempt to seek a solution of the issue by force,
> (b) that Formosa should not be used as a base for attacks on the Chinese mainland.

3. The purpose behind the changes is explained at the end of the attached text. As Allison pointed out, the United States do not assume that Formosa must inevitably go to the Chinese Communists (at least for some time) and wish to stress two considerations in addition to the conflicting Chinese claims: the interests of the Formosans and the maintenance of peace in the Pacific. The implication is that it might be contrary to both considerations to hand Formosa to the Communists in the near future. In support of this Allison maintained that it is by no means clear that the Communists are going to be able to maintain complete control of the mainland; that China may be in for a continuation of the internal disturbances and divisions which have been characteristic of her modern history; and that, in the circumstances, it would not necessarily be wise to transfer Formosa from a moribund claimant to one whose authority is still dubious. (If this represents more than pre-election rationalizing, it makes the solution of both the Formosa problem and of Chinese representation in the United Nations more difficult than ever).

4. The United Kingdom draft had been intended to provide a means of putting the question on ice for the time being, with as limited a commitment as possible on the part of the General Assembly and with the implication that the task in hand is to find a suitable formula which would permit the Chinese Communists to gain control without resort to force. (The United Kingdom officials concerned say privately that force is the only eventual solution and a resolution can only hope to delay this). The United States have now carried the United Kingdom draft to its logical conclusion and amended it to make it quite clear that responsibility for Formosa should be vested in the United Nations. If the Communists do not wait for an Assembly recommendation, the issue would immediately be referred to the Security Council, presumably as a breach of the peace, and then to the Assembly again under the "United Action" resolution.[42] If the United States draft were adopted, it would be difficult for the other members of the United Nations to refuse to accept the responsibility for neutralizing Formosa that is now held by the United States through the Seventh Fleet.

5. As an indication of United States thinking, Allison said that this resolution would not put the General Assembly in the impossible position of trying to handle something beyond its powers. It would be a genuine deterrent, since Peking would hesitate to take action, unless the Chinese Communists and the Russians are ready to start the major war. In other words, the United States would like to equate Formosa with South Korea.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

[October 19, 1950]

Following is modified text of British draft with our additions and changes:

"Noting (A) that the signatories to the Cairo declaration declared it to be one of their purposes that all the territories that Japan had stolen from the Chinese, including Formosa and the Pescadores should be restored to the Republic of China;

"(B) that no formal act restoring sovereignty to China has yet occurred, although at the end of hostilities with Japan the Chinese Nationalist Government was permitted to assume the administration of the island;

"Recognizing that two parties, both Chinese, at present claim the right to administer Formosa, that there have been threats of an armed attack on Formosa from the Chinese mainland and that Formosa has been used as a base for attacks on the Chinese mainland, and that an attempt to settle the dispute by force or the continuance of attacks on the Chinese mainland from Formosa would heighten international tension at a time when the situation in the Pacific area is already tense as a result of events in Korea, and would be prejudicial to the interests of the people of Formosa;

"Decides to establish a Commission composed of the representatives of (specified states) which, bearing in mind China's claims, taking into account the interests of the people of Formosa, and giving consideration to the maintenance of peace in the Pacific, should study the problem and submit a report to the GA containing recommendations for the future of Formosa and the Pescadores. The Commission should consult all government authorities and parties concerned, including both Chinese claimants;

"Recommends that, pending the study by the Commission and adoption by the GA of recommendations concerning this problem (A) there be no attempt to seek a solution of the status of Formosa by force, (B) Formosa not to be used as a base for attacks on the Chinese mainland;

"Requests both Chinese parties to act in conformity with the recommendations in the preceding para;

"Recommends to the SC that it consider immediately any action in contravention of (A) or (B) of above recommendation with a view to adopting appropriate measures for the maintenance of international peace and security;

"Requests all parties to render every possible assistance to the Commission in the performance of its tasks."

In the first operative paragraph beginning with "decides" insertion of phrase "taking into account the interests of the people of Formosa" is predicated upon our belief that interests of Formosan people should be mentioned on equal level with China's claim. In addition to China's claim and wishes of Formosans' broad interests of UN in peace of Pacific area also a factor to be taken into account.

Rephrasing of first recommendation is drafting change designed primarily to define more clearly the period during which that recommendation applies.

Department believes desirable that first recommendation of British draft be further strengthened. With this in mind Department has added recommendation referring to SC action as warning to those who might violate recommendation to refrain from use of force.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Repeat Washington No. 31.

At Commonwealth meeting yesterday morning the three following topics were discussed which are covered in my three immediately following teletypes.†

FORMOSA

The United Kingdom representative (Younger) referred to previous United States redraft of United Kingdom draft resolution on Formosa (which was sent to you under cover of my despatch No. 79 of October 20th)† which contained a number of points which the United Kingdom Government had not approved. As a result of further conversations with United States officials, State Department had produced a further redraft but this had not yet been finally approved by the United States Government.

Following is text of this latest United States redraft of United Kingdom resolution, Begins:

"Noting that the signatories to the Cairo Declaration declared it to be one of their purposes that certain of the territories formerly held by Japan, including

Formosa and the Pescadores, should be restored to the Republic of China, and that no formal act restoring sovereignty to China has yet occurred;

Recognizing that two parties at present claim the right to administer Formosa, that there have been threats of an armed attack on Formosa from the Chinese Mainland and that Formosa has been used as a base for attacks on the Chinese Mainland, that attempts to settle the dispute by force would heighten international tension and be prejudicial to the maintenance of international peace and order in the area as well as prejudicial to the interests of the people of Formosa; and further

Recognizing that the foregoing considerations raise questions as to the obligations and responsibilities of members under the Charter;

Decides to establish a Commission composed of the representatives of the following States (5-7) which, bearing in mind the considerations set forth in the preceding paragraphs should study the problem and submit a report to the General Assembly containing recommendations for the future of Formosa and the Pescadores. The Commission should consult all Governments, authorities and parties concerned;

Recommends that, pending the study by the Commission and adoption by the General Assembly of recommendations concerning this problem there be no attempt to change the status of Formosa by force and that there be neither (a) armed attack on Formosa from the Chinese Mainland, or (b) attack on the Chinese Mainland from Formosa;

Requests all Governments and authorities concerned to act in conformity with the recommendation in the preceding paragraph and render every possible assistance to the Commission in the performance of its tasks." Ends.

2. It was generally felt by the meeting that this would be a great improvement over the earlier United States redraft. As you will notice, it omits reference to "taking into account the interests of the people of Formosa and giving consideration to the maintenance of peace in the Pacific" as also to the provision that the Commission should consult all "Government authorities and parties concerned including both Chinese claimants" which appeared in the earlier United States draft. The United Kingdom delegation expressed the view that as it had been decided to include Formosa on the agenda of the Assembly, they thought that the approach outlined in this draft was about the best that could be hoped for. They had not yet referred it to the United Kingdom Government, but it was apparent that they would probably be able to sponsor it. The Australians also stated that they would be willing to sponsor such a resolution. Younger explained that the United States were anxious to get a large number of sponsors for the resolution. He added that sponsorship would not imply an obligation to service on the Commission of 5-7 members referred to in the body of the resolution. I said that our general position was that we did not wish to see the United Nations given the same sort of responsibility for Formosa that they had for Korea. We should have preferred not to have Formosa on the agenda of the General Assembly at all — as it had been included — we now favoured an approach which should saddle the General Assembly with the minimum responsibilities for the future of Formosa. In this connection I pointed out that the present wording of paragraph 3 of the resolution — "recognizing that the foregoing considerations raise questions as to the obligations and responsibilities of members under the Charter" — might cause complications. For example, I pointed out that one of the "foregoing considerations" was the fact that Formosa had been used as a base for attacks on the Chinese Mainland. Was it therefore suggested that members of the United Nations had obligations and responsibilities in connection with such an attack?

3. Other delegations, including the South Africans and Indians, agree that the wording of this paragraph was too wide, and in general showed a reserve similar to our own about the United Nations' assumption of responsibility for Formosa. In conclusion I indicated that it was unlikely that Canada would sponsor the resolution on Formosa. There was little general discussion at the meeting. The United Kingdom delegation said that they saw little prospect of getting the Americans to modify the draft further. Personally I am inclined to think that we shall be lucky if the United States' Government approve the draft put forward by the State Department officials, which seems to be about the best we can hope for in the circumstances.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following from Reid. Your telegram No. 330 of November 3.† Formosa.

1. Debate on the Formosan question could develop into one of the most explosive and divisive disputes of this session of the General Assembly. This item bristles with difficulties. Both Chinese factions are dead set against any proposal that will question their unshakable determination that Formosa is and shall remain a part of the Chinese state. Asian opinion which reacted strongly to President Truman's statement of June 27 "neutralizing" Formosa, will be suspicious of any proposal that would appear to give United Nations approval for maintaining Formosa as a part of the United States military defence arc in the Western Pacific. It would also consider any proposal that the United Nations should assume jurisdiction concerning the future disposition of Formosa as an undesirable interference in the internal affairs of China. Other powers will be doubtful of the wisdom of the United Nations assuming any responsibility regarding Formosa extending beyond the duration of President Truman's "neutralization" which he said in a conference on August 31 would be terminated at the end of the Korean campaign. Many would question the principle of repudiating the Cairo Declaration. Any solution which appeared to ignore China's title to Formosa would never be acceptable to the Chinese people and Formosa would remain the object of irredentist ambitions and be a constant source of friction between China and the West. Formosa could only be withheld from Chinese Communist control so long as substantial forces were available for its defence. This would mean a heavy commitment of indefinite duration and of questionable strategic desirability. An impartial plebiscite in Formosa would be impossible as long as Chiang Kai-shek and his forces remain in control there and it is doubtful if any but the Chinese Communists wish to assume responsibility for removing them from control in Formosa. If the United Nations should decide to award Formosa to the Chinese Communists but defer the hand-over for a period they would again be faced with the problem of taking care of Chiang Kai-shek and his army.

2. For the reasons mentioned in the previous paragraph, we believe that the Formosan question should be approached very cautiously. We think that care should be taken to ascertain the views of the Asian members at as early a stage as possible in determining the best way of dealing with this question on the agenda. We think that any draft resolution should be examined carefully to see the extent of responsibility which the United Nations might be expected to assume.

3. The revised United Kingdom draft resolution contained in your telegram No. 300 of November 3 does not say how soon the Commission is to report to the General Assembly. It could hardly report to this session. If the Commission's report is not made until the next session, the United Nations may be assuming a moral obligation to prevent either side from seeking a solution by force before then. This is an obligation that would extend beyond that which President Truman took on unilaterally in June as he is quoted in his press conference on August 31 as saying: "Of course, it will not be necessary to keep the Seventh Fleet in the Formosa Straits if the Korean thing is settled. That is a flank protection on our part for the United Nations forces".

4. The United Kingdom draft resolution does not indicate what the Assembly will do to implement the recommendation of the Commission. If it tries to enforce a solution unwanted by the Nationalists or the Communists it may be assuming a very onerous task.

5. The revised United Kingdom resolution sets the Formosan problem against a broader new backdrop of "the maintenance of international peace and order in the area" going beyond the implication of President Truman's statements of June 27 and July 19 that the "neutralizing" of Formosa was related to the Korean operations. This leaves the way open to the permanent neutralization of Formosa which is probably desired by United States military strategists and would add to our general security in the Western Pacific but which would definitely not seem to us to be worth the political complications and military underwriting implied.

6. It seems to us that some effort should be made at this stage to get a number of the more important delegations to understand where each thinks they are going in supporting the current United Kingdom resolution. The United States apparently wants the United Nations to assume responsibility for Formosa as it did for Korea and it undoubtedly hopes for the permanent neutralization of Formosa. The Indians, according to your telegram No. 205 of October 20† seem to think that the United Kingdom draft resolutions are nothing but a convenient way of joining Formosa to the mainland without fighting. How Chiang Kai-shek and his army are to be ousted is left unanswered. The United Kingdom seems to be trying to find middle ground, but appears to us to be going too far to meet the United States position.

7. If it is desired to have a milder resolution which would not saddle the United Nations with responsibilities it might find difficult or inadvisable to carry out, my immediately following telegram contains a draft which might be used for discussion with other delegations.

The General Assembly of the United Nations

Having in mind that United Nations armed forces are at present operating in Korea in accordance with the recommendations of the Security Council of 27 June, 1950, subsequent to its resolution of 25 June, 1950, that members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area;

Recalling its resolution of 7 October 1950 establishing a United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea to represent the United Nations in bringing about the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic government of all Korea;

Noting that there have been threats of an armed attack on Formosa from the Chinese mainland and that Formosa has been used as a base for attacks on the Chinese mainland;

Considering that an armed attack on Formosa from the Chinese mainland or an armed attack on the Chinese mainland from Formosa might directly or indirectly interfere with the efforts of the United Nations armed forces to restore international peace and security in the Korea area;

Calls upon the parties to the dispute over Formosa to refrain from taking hostile action against each other while the United Nations armed forces are engaged in restoring international peace and security in the Korea area;

Urges the parties to endeavour to settle their differences by peaceful means and to this end offers its good offices to the parties;

Requests the Secretary General to consult the parties with a view to establishing a mutually agreeable procedure for the appointment of a mediator who, on behalf of the United Nations would endeavour to assist the parties to settle their differences by peaceful means. Ends.

1. Text of alternative draft resolution contained in your teletype No. 230 of November 7th did not reach this office in time for the Minister to examine it before he left for Ottawa. It seems to me that your alternative draft resolution, by limiting Assembly's recommendation to duration of Korean war and doing no more in regard to long term problem than enjoining peaceful procedures upon Chinese Communists and Nationalists, is an ingenious way of reducing to a minimum the United Nations commitment on Formosa. It seems to me, however, that object of United States policy is to commit United Nations as fully as possible to defence of Formosa, and they would dislike intensely the alternative resolution you have proposed. If, therefore, we canvass other delegations on the possibility of putting in a resolution along the lines suggested, we shall immediately encounter the hostility of both United States and United Kingdom delegations. I think for this reason that before we consider further the possibility of alternative draft resolution along the lines suggested in your teletype No. 230 of November 7th, we should have a clear instruction in this regard.

2. The Minister did, however, see your telegram No. 229 of November 6th, and he agreed that I should prepare a memorandum on the basis of this telegram and show it to the United Kingdom delegation, and possibly to the United States delegation, as an indication of our misgivings. This memorandum is now in the course of preparation. I shall not, however, show draft resolution in your teletype No. 230 of November 7th to other delegations pending further instructions from you.

1. I discussed with the Minister late yesterday afternoon the question whether you should show our alternative draft resolution to the United States, the United Kingdom and the Indian delegations. The Minister's decision is that you should show these delegations the memorandum which you have prepared but that you should not, for the present at least, show them the draft resolution.

2. One of the reasons for his decision is that if we were to show our draft resolution now we would immediately be subjected to pressure from the United States and the United Kingdom to amend it. He, therefore, thinks that the resolution should be kept in reserve for possible introduction in the Committee after the debate has started.

3. So far as the United Kingdom-United States draft resolution is concerned, the Minister says that we certainly cannot sponsor it and that we might have to vote against it in Committee.

4. I think it would be useful if you were to send to Washington and to us the text of your memorandum and if Washington were to take it up on a pretty high level in the State Department. We will consider here whether we should send it to London so that Canada House can discuss it with the Foreign Office.

Following is text of memorandum concerning proposed draft resolution on Formosa:

OBSERVATIONS CONCERNING PROPOSED DRAFT RESOLUTION ON FORMOSA

Both Chinese factions are firmly opposed to any proposal that will question their unshakable conviction that Formosa is and shall remain a part of the Chinese State. Some Asian opinion, which reacted strongly to President Truman's statement of June 27th "neutralizing" Formosa, may equally be suspicious of any proposal that might appear to them to give United Nations approval for maintaining Formosa as a part of the United States military defence arc in the Western Pacific. It might also be considered by people in Asia that any proposal that the United Nations should assume jurisdiction concerning the future disposition of Formosa is an undesirable interference in the internal affairs of China. Some powers may well be doubtful of the wisdom of the United Nations assuming any responsibility for Formosa extending beyond the duration of President Truman's "neutralization", which he said in a conference on August 31st would be terminated at the end of the Korean campaign. Some might also question what they would consider a repudiation of the Cairo declaration. Any solution which appeared to ignore China's title to Formosa would never be acceptable to the Chinese people and Formosa would remain the object of irredentist ambitions and be a constant source of friction between China and the West. Formosa could only be withheld from Chinese Communist control so long as substantial forces were available for its defence. This would mean a heavy military commitment of indefinite duration, the strategic desirability of which has not been clearly demonstrated. An impartial plebiscite in Formosa would be extremely difficult to arrange as long as Chiang Kai-Shek and his forces remain in control there, and it is doubtful if any but the Chinese Communists wish to assume responsibility for removing them or restraining their control in Formosa. If the proposed United Nations Commission recommends that Formosa should be united with the Chinese mainland, even if the transfer is deferred for a period, the problem of disposing of Chiang Kai-Shek and his army would become acute.

2. The revised United Kingdom draft resolution does not indicate when the Commission is to report to the General Assembly. It could hardly report to this session. If the Commission's report is not made until the next session, the United Nations may be assuming a moral obligation to prevent either side from seeking a solution by force before then. This is an obligation that would extend beyond that undertaken by President Truman in June when, according to the report of his press conference on August 31st, he said, "Of course, it will not be necessary to keep the seventh fleet in the Formosa Straits if the Korean thing is settled. That is a flank protection on our part for the United Nations forces."

3. The revised United Kingdom resolution sets the Formosan problem against the background of "the maintenance of international peace and order in the area", going beyond the implication of President Truman's statements of June 27th and July 19th that the "neutralizing" of Formosa was related to the Koran operations. This leaves the way open for proposals that Formosa should be detached from China or permanently neutralized, and the attitude adopted by some delegations, particularly Latin American delegations during the discussions on China in 1949, suggest that some such radical proposal might well be put forward. It is by no means clear that the political complications and the heavy military commitment that would arise immediately an effort were made to restrict Chinese control over Formosa or remove the Island from effective Chinese authority would be offset by corresponding strategic compensations.

FORMOSA

Following from Riddell, Begins: Revised memorandum on Formosa has now been shown to United Kingdom, Australian, New Zealand and Indian delegations. As you suggested, I informed Indian delegation that copy of memorandum was being given to their Department of External Affairs by our Embassy. Indians inform me that, although they had originally been favourably impressed with the draft resolution, they did not now think they would be able to support it. Berendson, after brief examination of the memorandum, said that he did not see what else we could do except support proposals for a Commission on Formosa and that he would like to know what conclusions we drew as a result of expression of misgivings contained in our memorandum. United Kingdom delegation asked whether we had given a copy of our memorandum to Americans, and said they considered it was our responsibility to express these misgivings to the United States delegation. I said that we had not given United States delegation a copy of the memorandum nor were we at present discussing the question with them. I said, however, that the Minister had given Mr. Acheson personally some idea of our misgivings when he visited Washington recently.

2. United Kingdom delegation has not yet received firm instructions either to sponsor the draft resolution or to support it. They are not therefore certain whether they will be in a position to put it in when the debate on Formosa opens and neither are they certain whether draft resolution has been finally approved by United States Government, although they are inclined to think that United States Government approves the resolution in its present form. United States delegation here, at the official level, is considering for membership on the Formosan Commission the following States: United Kingdom, United States, India or Burma, Thailand, Philippines and Australia. In the light of comment made today by Indian delegation, I would not, however, expect India to accept the nomination. Ends.

FORMOSA

When Political Committee concluded discussion on Greek item at noon Wednesday, Chairman announced that Committee would re-assemble in afternoon to discuss Formosa. Expectation was that United States delegation would immediately introduce a resolution. Morning press had carried a summary of proposed United States resolution, and during Wednesday morning United States Press Officer confirmed to correspondents report that United States resolution would be tabled.

2. When Committee met, however, Dulles said that, because discussions concerning Formosa would shortly take place in Security Council, and also because of unsettled conditions in the Far East, United States delegation now wished to postpone consideration of Formosa by Political Committee. He therefore proposed that item should be placed last on Committee agenda.

3. Apparently during noon hour Wednesday Americans realized for first time that support for their resolution was not assured. United Kingdom delegation had not yet been given clearance even to vote for it, much less sponsor it. Australian delegation was likewise uncertain of its position, and refused entirely to accept nomination for proposed Commission. United States may also have learned that Indians would not support their resolution or serve on this Commission and they were reminded during the morning of Canadian misgivings. In the light of these circumstances, Dulles apparently first suggested that debate should go forward without any resolution being tabled. He was dissuaded from this course of action by Younger and he then decided to suggest postponement.

4. After Dulles had made his proposal for deferment in Committee, he was followed immediately by Tsiang who suggested that his item on Soviet aggression in China be taken next, and that he be granted 24 hour adjournment to give him time for preparation. Malik at once seized the initiative which had been dropped by Dulles to attack United States policy in Formosa. He said that U.S.S.R. considered United States item on future of Formosa inappropriate, since United States had already signed undertaking to restore Formosa to China. As far as he was concerned, discussion on this subject could be postponed indefinitely. He would, however, like to discuss his item on United States aggression against China in Formosa, and he was prepared to do so immediately. A confused discussion on procedure then took place, at the conclusion of which it was decided to take up Tsiang's item next, then U.S.S.R. item on Formosa and finally United States item on Formosa. In the course of this discussion, Malik tried unsuccessfully to persuade the Committee to consider a proposal that the Communist Chinese should be asked to participate in the discussion of his item. Because of intervening plenary session, Committee adjourned until Monday.

5. Dulles, in defending his request for postponement against Malik's derisive criticism, said that when United States had put Formosa on the agenda, Korean war seemed near its conclusion. Now, however, Chinese intervention had prolonged that war, China was also intervening in Tibet and Indo-China, and primary objective now must be to assist Security Council in preventing general war in the Far East. In this part of his statement, which probably sounded more ominous than he realized or intended, he came very close to saying that war with China was so imminent that it would be a waste of time to discuss the future of Formosa.

1. A copy of the revised memorandum on Formosa was given to Clubb, Director of the Chinese Office at the State Department, yesterday afternoon. Clubb said that he was very glad to receive this statement of our views but showed no disposition to make any comments. In fact, he merely reiterated what we had been told before that the United States Government believes that it is necessary for some time to come to take precautions against possible attempts to solve the Formosa problem by force because of the psychological effect that Communist armed success would have in Asia at this time.

FORMOSA

Following for Under-Secretary from Riddell, Begins: Our telegram No. 409 of November 16th.

1. United Kingdom delegation has now suggested a somewhat different explanation than the one given in telegram under reference for the sudden request of the United States delegation for postponement of the debate on Formosa. According to this explanation, at the last moment a sudden difference of opinion emerged in the United States delegation over the terms of the draft resolution on Formosa. Some members of the delegation, of whom Senator Lodge was the most outspoken, insisted that the draft resolution was not sufficiently explicit in indicating that Formosa should not (repeat not) be restored to China, and that if the United States delegation submitted this resolution, it would be taken that they were trying to appease the Communist Chinese. In view of this difference of opinion, United States delegation decided to ask for postponement.

2. At a meeting of the Commonwealth delegations on Friday morning last, there was a general review of the position in regard to Formosa. Younger and Jebb did not (repeat not) seem to consider that resolution establishing a Commission on Formosa would necessarily involve United Nations in any commitment, either to defend the island or eventually to do anything about the proposals which the Commission might put forward. If United States eventually submitted resolution along the lines of the draft which had been prepared, they would therefore give it their support. They did not, however, think that any of the great Powers should be represented on the proposed Commission.

3. Berendsen of New Zealand concurred in United Kingdom position and said that he thought the draft resolution was the least that could possibly be done once the subject had been put on the agenda, as was now the case. South African delegation said that it was prepared to support the draft resolution as a first step, but it seriously doubted whether United Nations would have the competence to carry out anything that the proposed Commission might recommend. Pakistani said his Government would support draft resolution. Mr. Pearson on the other hand suggested that effect of draft resolution would be to put the United Nations on the road towards a major commitment in regard to Formosa, and that even though this were only a first step, it would be difficult later to retreat. Indian representative said that this was now generally their position, and stated explicitly that they could neither support the resolution nor serve on the Commission. Keith Officer said that Australian Government would be unable to support the draft resolution because of considerations similar to those suggested by Mr. Pearson.

4. Since there will probably be further discussions on this question amongst Commonwealth delegations and with the United States within the next few days, it would be useful to know whether the Department had any comment on the position as outlined in the draft statement contained in my telegram No. 401 of November 15th.† This statement was drafted on the assumption, which may not (repeat not) be correct, that delegation will take some part in opposing United States draft resolution if it is eventually submitted. It may, however, be difficult to oppose the United States publicly on this subject, especially since the questions raised in the proposed draft statement are somewhat similar to arguments advanced by the Soviet delegation. There might therefore be some advantage in trying to persuade the United States privately either to modify its position before the resolution is put in, or alternatively to have the subject postponed until next year.

5. Full account of the discussion on Formosa in the Commonwealth delegations meeting is contained in minutes† which are being forwarded by bag. Ends.

FORMOSA

1. You will have seen from telegrams from the delegation during the week-end that there is some likelihood that, when Formosa item is reached on Agenda, United States delegation will press for resolution in even stronger terms than draft recently under consideration. On the other hand, it is clear that there is growing concern, amongst Commonwealth delegations at least, over prospect of extending United Nations commitment in Far East through establishment of Commission on Formosa.

2. In these circumstances, I think we should take the opportunity given by postponement to review with the State Department the position in regard to Formosa. I hope United States officials realize fully that we are opposed to the acceptance by the United Nations of any commitment in Formosa beyond the limits already accepted by Mr. Truman for the United States, — neutralization for the duration of the fighting in Korea. For this reason, we dislike proposal to appoint a United Nations Commission to consider the future of Formosa because we think that this would imply a commitment by United Nations to defend the island while the Commission was preparing its report, and might lead to a further commitment arising out of the Commission's report.

3. I have been wondering whether, in view of the misgivings of their friends on this subject, and perhaps also because of their own divided counsels, United States Government might not be prepared to permit the Formosa item to lapse during this Assembly. Arguments which Dulles advanced last week for postponing the item until later in this session will, in all probability, be equally applicable two or three weeks hence. United States delegation might, therefore, be prepared to ask for further postponement on these grounds. Any embarrassment they might feel in doing so would certainly be less than difficulties which will arise if, in Political Committee, impressive common purpose which was shown over Korea disappears during discussion of Formosa.

4. I should be grateful if you would discuss Formosa item with State Department along lines indicated in this telegram and let me know results of your conversations.

5. My immediately following teletype† contains relevant passage of a public statement which I made at Windsor on November 15th.[43] I presume that full text of this statement will have been sent you from Ottawa.

6. Since this message was written, I have had a long conversation with Hickerson, to whom I have expressed most of the ideas expressed above. A full account of my conversation with Hickerson will follow.†

TELEGRAM WA-3024 Washington, November 22, 1950

Addressed Candel No. 57.
Your telegram No. 57, Formosa.

1. I have discussed with Dean Rusk today the arguments for postponing the Assembly resolution on Formosa. Rusk said that this matter was being given consideration and he seemed to think that it was quite likely that the United States would agree to postponement until the next session or to reference by the Assembly to the Interim Committee. He asked me to make it clear to you that postponement was not, in his view, any step to the solution of the Formosa problem and also that it would involve the continued use of the Seventh Fleet, to prevent hostilities between Formosa and the Mainland, for an indefinite period.

[43] Pour un extrait de cette déclaration, voir Documents sur la crise coréenne, pp. 13-14.
For an excerpt from this statement, see Documents on the Korean Crisis pp. 12-13.

2. He said that there were three main purposes towards the Formosa issue in the current United States policy:

(a) Formosa should not pass into hostile hands. The United States has the major responsibility for maintaining security in the Far East and in the event of war would have by far the largest military commitment there. The substantial non-Communist resources on the island, both in manpower and in other respects, could not be handed over to Peking at a time of great tension.

(b) They were anxious to prevent the disposition of the island becoming a serious issue between friends whose policies were already divergent on Far Eastern questions. Therefore they favoured injecting it into the United Nations Forum, where it might be discussed in the usual manner for perhaps two or three years, after which the situation should be clearer and the policies of the democratic countries less divergent.

(c) No steps should be taken at the present time which would have the effect of injecting Formosa as a possible issue leading to war.

3. In illustrating these points he made a number of comments. He asked me whether the Canadian Government supported the immediate application of the Cairo Declaration. When I said that we believed that the Cairo Declaration should be observed as requiring that Formosa should become part of China rather than an independent or trusteeship territory, he asked whether that meant that we supported immediate recognition of the authority of the Peking Government over Formosa. I said that we were making no such suggestion, but that our present concern was that the United Nations might by implication be saddled with responsibility for enforcing a recommendation on the future of Formosa if the resolution before the Assembly were adopted. He made it clear that the settled policy here is not to accept the Cairo Declaration as a binding obligation in present circumstances.

4. He also said that the movements of Communist forces on the Mainland seemed to indicate that there was no early intention to deliver an attack on Formosa.

CHINESE ITEM

Following from Riddell, Begins: Late Tuesday and early Wednesday, in consultation with the United Kingdom, Australian and Indian delegations, we made a canvass of other delegations and found that surprising number were prepared to act together to oppose establishing a Special Commission on the Chinese charges or even referring them to the Interim Committee. Younger and Keith Officer both spoke in this sense early in Wednesday morning's meeting and were supported by several other delegations.

3. In the meantime, however, United States delegation had confirmed its support for Chinese proposal or alternatively for suggestion that question be referred to Interim Committee. Before meeting on Wednesday, Dulles spoke to me and asked that we should refrain from submitting any alternative resolution and that we should not obstruct some action being taken on the Chinese request for further' investigation. At the end of the meeting on Wednesday morning he made a brief but strong statement in the course of which he said that those who opposed further investigation were motivated by unwillingness to press charges against a Great Power. He developed this view at some length but his allegation was summarized in the following sentence:

"The question really is: if we bury it, we will bury it because we are afraid that by looking into this matter we will annoy or aggravate one of the so-called Great Powers."

4. Both Keith Officer and I spoke to Dulles immediately after meeting and said that motives which he has attributed to delegations which did not support his position were discreditable. Officer said that he deeply resented this interpretation of a position which he had taken. I remarked that there were many occasions in United Nations when delegations like ours had supported, voted for and sometimes initiated actions which were disliked by the Soviet Union, and that I did not see how we could leave on the record a suggestion that we were afraid to support his position because we were unwilling to annoy the U.S.S.R. Dulles, who didn't seem to understand what I was talking about subsequently said that he would try to make amends, but a brief statement he made at the opening of the afternoon meeting, was not very helpful. Consequently, after consultation with Mr. Lapointe, I inserted a reference to Mr. Dulles' remarks into a short statement I made in the afternoon. Text of the paragraph referring to Mr. Dulles statement is given in my immediately following teletype.† Full text of statement† will follow by bag.

5. Incident is of importance only as evidence of sensitivity of United States delegation to any opposition to their Chinese policy, and to constant danger that underlying differences on Chinese policies which divide Western States will find disconcerting public expression. This morning (Thursday) for example, Tsiang, in a speech designed to play upon these differences, has compared Dulles to Stimson[44] and has characterized the United Kingdom and France as "appeasers". Ends.

FORMOSA

Following from Riddell, Begins: Statement regarding Formosa given by Rusk to Mr. Wrong and reported in Washington's telegram No. 57 to New York and WA-3024 to Ottawa of November 22nd is fullest and most coherent account we have yet received of United States policy on this subject. Rusk makes it explicit that strategic importance of denying use of island to Communists outweighs, in United States view, any other consideration. This frank and unequivocal statement is immensely more helpful than Hickerson's unconvincing confidences to the effect that United States was prepared "to take the skeletons out of the cupboard" and state that it now believes that wishes of inhabitants of Formosa must be consulted, and that United States is prepared to concur in anything those inhabitants decided upon, including return to China.

2. Rusk's argument may influence our judgment that it is unwise to proceed in the United Nations with a course of action which will entail a United Nations commitment to defend Formosa. It seems to me, incidentally, that such a commitment will be established whether a Commission is set up or a reference made to the Interim Committee. I wonder, therefore, whether, before we proceed further in discussing with other delegations our attitude towards United States proposals, or in developing our opposition to them, we should not review our policy in the light of Rusk's argument. If it is correct that security in the far east now makes it essential to deny use of the island to Communist Chinese, then we should possibly alter our position. If, alternatively, we continue to oppose the United States proposals, we should I think be quite sure either that we do not concur in United States estimate of strategic importance of island, or alternatively that we consider United States motives in regard to Formosa to have some other origin, such, perhaps, as unwillingness in the face of domestic criticism, to permit further advances to Communist Chinese.

3. With the possibility of some such review of policy in mind, I should like to make this following comment on Rusk's views as expressed in paragraph 2 of Mr. Wrong's telegram under reference:

(a) We have been assuming, I think, that in the long run accommodation with the new Chinese Government was the most important objective, from both the political and strategic point of view, and that with this end in view, we should, even while accepting a good deal of abuse from Peiping, try to remove or reduce situations which might lead them to believe that they had more to fear from the West than from Moscow. Accommodation with Peiping will never be possible if Formosa is denied to them, or neutralized without their consent. A year ago the defence of Formosa did not seem to figure in United States strategic plans. Are we to assume now that events in Korea and the more menacing aspect of the Chinese Communists make it essential to secure Formosa for strategic reasons, even at the cost of postponing indefinitely any possibility of accommodation with Peiping?

(b) Rusk's statement that they are anxious to prevent the disposition of the island becoming a serious issue between friends seems to me to point, not to Rusk's conclusion that Formosa should be "injected into the United Nations forum", but to exactly the contrary conclusion. The debate on Tsiang's complaint of Soviet aggression which has just concluded is a painful demonstration of the disarray into which the Western Allies fall when they are forced to discuss Chinese policy publicly. It evoked one of the most irritable and indignant speeches I have ever heard from Berendson, who castigated, in the full sense of that term, his fellow Commonwealth delegates for breaking with the United States and choosing strange Communist bedfellows. It enabled Tsiang to observe that Western Europe, in the spirit of appeasement, had sided with Eastern Europe, and that only the United States and Latin America remained faithful to freedom. It gave Dulles the occasion to describe those of us who did not support him as craven and it moved unnumberable Latin Americans to beat their breasts and denounce us for betraying sacred principles which they were prepared to defend to the last United Nations Commissioner. It afforded immense comfort to the Communists, who it seems to me will again be the only ones to benefit from further public humiliation of this kind, which we shall certainly have if we are forced to debate publicly Far Eastern policies about which there are divided counsels.

(c) I am not sure what Rusk means by the statement report in paragraph 2 (c).

4. If it is possible to draw any conclusions from my observations, they seem to be the following:

(a) We should consider whether or not we concur in what appears now to be the United States opinion that it is essential, for strategic reasons, to deny Formosa to the Communists.

(b) If we do concur, we should consider whether the proposed action through United Nations is the least harmful way of achieving that object.

5. I shall await further instructions before proceeding as directed in telegram No. 433 of November 18th. Ends.

Repeat Washington EX-2421.
Following for Riddell, Begins: Your teletype No. 483 of November 24, repeated to Washington as No. 66. Formosa.

2. We have asked National Defence as a matter of urgency to give us their appreciation of the strategic importance of denying the use of Formosa to the Chinese Communists. As soon as we receive this appreciation we shall review our policy in the light of the military and political considerations.

3. Meantime, I assume that you are keeping in close touch with the Australian and Indian delegations, who share our views.

4. There are some preliminary comments of a general nature which I should like to make on the conclusion in sub-paragraph 3b of your teletype that the recent public exhibition in the General Assembly of the disunity of the West on Chinese issues afforded immense comfort to the Communists who would again be the only ones to benefit from further public humiliation of this kind, which we shall have if we are forced to debate publicly Far Eastern policies about which there are divided counsels.

5. I realize fully how difficult and embarrassing your position was during the debates last week on Chinese issues, and I want to take this opportunity to congratulate you on a fine performance. No one could have done a better job.

6. Any public exhibition of disunity will, of course, benefit the communists. But they would benefit as much, and possibly more, by a public demonstration of Western unity in defence of a bad cause. The gadarene swine made a most impressive public demonstration of unity of purpose and collective action.

7. In democratic countries, but not in Russia, there are every day public manifestations of lack of unity, public debates between advocates of conflicting policies. We pride ourselves on this distinction between our national societies and the Russian monolithic society.

8. I do not think, therefore, that we should be worried too much by occasional public manifestations of differences in the United Nations, though it is always worrying, of course, that the differences do in fact exist. We must always do our utmost to reach agreement in advance of public debate, on a policy which we all honestly believe to be the best in the circumstances. But if we are unable to do this, then there may be occasions when we cannot, or indeed should not, avoid public debate. From the Canadian point of view, such debate will certainly remove the impression that we are satellites of the United States, and that all the United States has to do in the United Nations on an issue which it considers important is to crack its whip and roll up a huge mechanical majority in the General Assembly.

9. This would bring the General Assembly into disrepute. It would lead to the spreading in the United States of the dangerous delusion that the United Nations can always be counted on to underwrite United States policy. Every member of the United Nations, large or small, must realize that it cannot always have its way in the United Nations.

10. I am not, of course, suggesting that we differ from the United States publicly on a matter which they consider of first class importance, merely for the sake of differing. I believe, however, that there may well be occasions in the future, as in the past, when we will have to express our differences with United States policy in the United Nations and elsewhere, though always seeking beforehand a solution which will make unnecessary such expression. It may be that Formosa will provide such an occasion, in spite of our best endeavour to avoid it.[45]

THE STRATEGIC IMPORTANCE OF FORMOSA

OBJECT

1. To assess the strategic importance of Formosa to the enemy:

(a) under present conditions;

(b) in terms of a full-scale war with communist China; and

(c) in terms of a full-scale war with the USSR.

ASSUMPTION

2. It is assumed that if the Communist Chinese occupy Formosa they will also occupy the Pescadores Islands.

FACTORS

Strategic Position

3. Formosa is approximately 225 miles long and varies from 60 to 80 miles in breadth. The island has a broad coastal plain in the west, the coast of which is well suited for large scale amphibious operations. It is one of a chain of islands extending from Kamchatka to Indonesia. It is approximately 100 nautical miles from the coast of China and within 500 nautical miles of Hong Kong, Okinawa and [45] L'étude du document américain sur Formose a été reportée indéfiniment le 7 février 1951.

Consideration of the American item on Formosa was postponed indefinitely on February 7, 1951.

Luzon. Dairen, a Soviet submarine base, is approximately 1,000 miles distant. The closest Soviet territory is Vladivostok, approximately 1,300 air miles distant.

Political

4. The Nationalist Chinese government has controlled Formosa since 1945. The Communist Chinese government has announced that it intends to take over the island at the earliest possible date. The island is the centre from which the Nationalists organize their operations against the Communists on the mainland. The United States government, at the beginning of the Korean war, announced that it would use its naval forces to neutralize the island pending the end of the war in Korea, thus preventing the Communist Chinese government from attacking the island. This unilateral action on the part of the United States has gained support principally from the Latin American countries, but the major Western Powers have not associated themselves with the United States' action, and some of the Far Eastern countries are thought to disapprove.

5. The people of Formosa probably have no preference between the Nationalist Chinese and the Communist Chinese. There was a bloody revolt against Nationalist maladministration in 1947 and the Formosans would probably prefer independence to any other status.

Economic

6. The population of Formosa, including the army and adherents of Chiang Kai-Shek, is approximately 8 million.

7. The economy is primarily agricultural and the island is self-sufficient in foodstuffs, although dependent upon imported fertilizers. It produces an exportable surplus of rice (800,000 tons in 1949-50), sugar, tea and fruits, and half of the world's camphor.

8. Abundant low-grade bituminous coal is mined (1.6 million tons in 1949), and small amounts are exported. Domestic production of petroleum is insignificant. Some non-ferrous metals are mined and salt is produced in exportable quantities. There is a 2 million kilowatt hydro-electric potential of which about 20 per cent has been developed.

9. Sugar refining is the most important industry. Cement is produced at the rate of 250,000 tons annually, and the production of fertilizers meets one sixth of the island's requirements. Crude oil is imported and the most important refinery has a capacity of 720,000 tons. Metallurgical industries produce 2,000 tons of aluminum annually from imported bauxite as well as small quantities of nickel-cobalt.

10. The transportation system is adequate for the economy.

11. Ports and Merchant Shipping. Formosa has two principal ports and about nine very minor ones. The largest and most important is Keelung (Kiirun) on the north coast, and the second is Kaohsiung (Takao) in the southwest, both deep-water ports. The former has a daily discharge capacity of 20,000 tons and the latter 14,000 tons. The Nationalist Chinese government controls a high proportion of Chinese merchant shipping, consisting, in August 1949, of approximately 140 vessels totalling 400,000 gross tons, including 23 tankers.

12. Airfields. Seventeen airfields and landing grounds are serviceable or could quickly be made so. Eleven have runways surfaced with concrete or macadam; five have runways of 5,000 feet or more. None is capable of taking modern heavy bombers or B-29 aircraft, but six are usable by Skymasters. About 50 former air facilities are classified as potential sites.

Armed Forces

13. Army. The Nationalist Chinese army has a strength of 300,000 men. There are no reserves. It has a conglomerate collection of obsolete equipment in poor repair, including approximately 500 tanks and 450 other armoured vehicles.

14. Navy. The Nationalist Chinese navy consists of 44,000 men. It has 7 destroyers, 20 escorts, 25 gunboats, approximately 18 minesweepers, 34 landing craft and numerous auxiliary vessels. There are three naval bases: Tsoying (Toshien), the main naval base, Keelung, a submarine base, and Makung (Mako), in the Pescadores Islands.

15. Air Force. The Nationalist Chinese air force consists of approximately 85,000 men and 800 to 1,000 aircraft, of which approximately 50 per cent are in operational units. The majority of aircraft are fighters. Other components consist of ground attack, light bombers, reconnaissance and transport aircraft. Operations are dependent upon foreign sources for logistic support.

DISCUSSION

General

16. Political. Formosa's principal political importance derives from the fact that it is not yet in Communist Chinese hands. So long as it is kept from the latter, Formosa acts as a source of discord among the non-communist members of the United Nations and effectively prevents any rapprochement between Communist China and the Western Powers. The incorporation of Formosa in the Communist Chinese state would add to the internal prestige of Mao Tse-tung and would greatly decrease the extent of nationalist intervention in continental China by eliminating the principal nationalist base. It would have little effect on his international prestige. It would cause a certain amount of dissension within the United States, where Formosa has acquired a domestic political importance in the debate between the two principal parties over Far Eastern policy. It is considered that the political effects of the incorporation of Formosa in Communist China would be the same in any of the three circumstances postulated in the Object.

17. Economic. China suffers from a serious food shortage and would derive some benefit from Formosa's surpluses of rice, sugar and other foods. Formosan industry is largely dependent upon imports and its products are small in relation to Chinese requirements. Industrial products, with the exception of aluminum, are of little strategic value. Under any of the three circumstances named in the Object, the possession of the economic resources of Formosa would be of some value to Communist China.

Strategic Importance of Formosa under Present Conditions

18. Possession of Formosa by communist Chinese forces would have little significance from the military point of view under present conditions although it is likely that the Communists would secure a portion of the military equipment and personnel of the Nationalist forces and merchant fleet.

Strategic Importance of Formosa in a Full-Scale War with Communist China

19. Possession of Formosa would deny to the Allies a base from which offensive operations against China could be launched. In addition to those advantages mentioned in paragraph 18, the Communists would obtain the following advantages:

Air

(a) Maritime Operations. Maritime operations could be extended into the Pacific by a further 150 nautical miles, although this would not include any additional significant areas. Furthermore, even without Formosa, the air force could, from bases on the mainland, cover all sea lines of communication passing between the Philippines and the Chinese mainland.

(b) Tactical Bomber and Fighter Operations. Northern Luzon in the Philippines could be brought within the radius of action of jet and piston-engined fighters, and light bombers could penetrate as far as the Manila area.

(c) Airborne Operations. Luzon from the Manila area northward would come within the radius of action of airborne operations from Formosa.

Navy

(d) It would provide advance bases for aggression in the islands of the South Pacific.

(e) It would provide Communist control of the Formosa Strait and deny naval bases to the Allies whose nearest operating bases to the China Coast would then be Hong Kong, the Philippines, Okinawa and Japan. As a result allied shipping would be more vulnerable to attack.

(f) It would facilitate mining of the Formosa Strait.

(g) Communist China's present naval strength would not allow her to take full advantage of Formosa's bases and strategic position, but in the event that she were given ships by the Soviet Union, she could attack vessels sailing from the Philippines and Hong Kong to Japan.

Ground Forces

(h) Formosa could be used as a base from which offensive airborne or amphibious operations might be launched. Adequate airfields exist to enable two airborne divisions (Western scale) to be launched. The two main ports of Keelung and Kaohsiung, together with several small harbours on the west coast, are capable of handling the assault craft and maintenance of up to 20 divisions (Western scale), provided the necessary stores were stockpiled beforehand and subject to the availability of the necessary naval and air lift.

Strategic Importance of Formosa in a Full-Scale War with the USSR

20. Strategically, the possession of Formosa, in addition to those advantages mentioned in paragraph 19, would provide the USSR with additional land, air and naval bases from which to conduct operations against the Philippines, Okinawa and Guam. However, the great importance to the USSR and China must remain its denial to the West for offensive purposes against the mainland.

CONCLUSIONS

21. It is concluded that:

(a) Politically, possession of Formosa would greatly decrease the extent of Nationalist intervention in continental China by eliminating the principal Nationalist base;

(b) Economically, the resources, and in particular the food surpluses, of Formosa would be of some value to Communist China;

(c) The strategic importance of Formosa to the enemy under present conditions is slight;

(d) The strategic importance of Formosa to the enemy in a full-scale war with Communist China and/or the USSR would be to provide the Communists with an additional base for launching offensive operations and, more important, to prevent the West from using it for offensive operations against the mainland.

TOP SECRET Ottawa, December 8, 1950

Dear General Foulkes,

FORMOSA

I refer to paragraphs 9-11 of telegram No. WA-3149 of December 6† from Washington summarizing the Attlee-Truman talks, copies of which have already been sent to the Secretary, Chiefs of Staff Committee. I enclose another copy for your convenience. These paragraphs indicate the U.S. are taking a very strong line on the question of Formosa, presumably on the advice of their Chiefs of Staff. Paragraph 11 indicates that the U.S. position is "based on a new strategic appreciation of its [Formosa's] importance to the U.S. defence system in the Pacific", and that the U.S. and U.K. attitudes on Formosa at present are "miles apart".

Since Formosa is almost certain to be a very important issue in any Far Eastern settlement, it might be very useful to know precisely what are the views of both the U.S. and U.K. Chiefs of Staff on its strategic importance. I appreciate that it would be unusual and perhaps not very tactful to approach either formally with a direct request for their views. It occurs to me, however, that you might be able to obtain these views on a personal basis. Perhaps you might have some opportunities for some "off the record" discussion when at the Military Committee meetings in London.

Anything you could do in getting us information on these matters would be greatly appreciated.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

TELEGRAM 2575 London, December 18, 1950

TOP SECRET. PRIORITY.

For Heeney from Foulkes. Further to my CJS(L)M311.†

1. I had a long talk with Admiral Sherman[46] and General Greunther on the question of Formosa. They both explained that the strategical value of Formosa was more negative than real. In other words they would be quite happy with Formosa being neutralized or in the control of anybody except the Communist Chinese. They emphasized that it would in the American Chiefs' view be intolerable to have their air routes between Okinawa and the Philippines interfered with by long-range fighters based on Formosa. I then put the direct question as to whether Formosa was of such strategical value to the U.S. that it was worthwhile fighting for. Both Sherman and Greunther came back immediately to say that in their opinion it was not worth risking a war and hastened to reaffirm that that did not mean that the Americans had any intention of relieving the seventh fleet from the responsibility of stopping Communist China capturing Formosa. They said there was a great difference between fighting a war over Formosa and attempting to keep it neutralized. I then asked whether the importance of Formosa would lessen should the Americans leave Korea. They both agreed it would and emphasized that they weren't going to leave Korea until a satisfactory solution to the Chinese difficulty was reached. I then asked the question were they intending to build up and fight a major war to re-occupy North Korea. They both shrugged their shoulders and said they didn't think so. Greunther then went to some length to explain that it was very difficult to answer these military questions without delving into the political business. He re-affirmed that the fighting in Korea was based on political considerations. Admiral Sherman intervened with remarks that there were always great difficulties in fighting these kinds of limited battles in which the Commander was constantly being tied by political considerations. He re-affirmed the view which I had expressed in a recent paper regarding strategical bombing. That it was necessary continually to remind the political authorities that when these political battles developed into a stage where the security of the Allied forces was threatened, then it must be understood that the military Commander must be allowed to use all the weapons and all the facilities at his disposal whenever and wherever he sees fit for the security of his forces. Sherman said he was very worried over this question of hamstringing the military. I then asked the question as to where in their opinion our main strategical interest lies. They both agreed it was in Western Europe and they both reluctantly came to the conclusion that there was a grave danger of trying to save face in the Far East and having too little too late in the West. However they continued to argue that to admit defeat in the East would only hasten the day when the Russians would feel strong enough to take us on in the West. Perhaps as you know it is common knowledge that Greunther is to be the Chief of Staff to Eisenhower and therefore I felt it desirable to secure his views on this question as there is no doubt he will be advising Eisenhower over this weekend. Greunther and Sherman left by air last night to brief Acheson and Pace before they come to the meetings in Brussels. Greunther was not sure whether he was coming back to Brussels but I rather suspect he is because Spofford remarked to me last night that he would be very unhappy if he could not get Greunther's advice in Brussels. From other sources I have gathered that there is genuine concern about Greunther leaving the Pentagon.

[46] Le vice-amiral Forrest P. Sherman, chef des opérations navales des États-Unis.
Vice-Admiral Forrest P. Sherman, United States Chief of Naval Operations.

2. Dana [Wilgress] and I are busy re-writing your paper on re-organization of NATO.[47] I will be quite surprised if you recognize the paper by the time you arrive in Brussels. I am attempting to bring the military paragraphs into line with what we have been discussing here. Then if you and Claxton agree with the paper I suggest that Dana should peddle around the political parts and I should attempt to get the military people to agree with the military parts. It is my view that we will never get the paper accepted without this kind of preparation. You would be surprised at the alarm and despondency which your paragraph on the military side created in the military sections. I am quite sure we must regain the military confidence which we have had before and as you know the smaller nations still look to Canada to take the lead in the Military Committee in military affairs. Looking forward to seeing you in Brussels. We hope to have the paper ready by then.

Memorandum from Head, United Nations Division, to Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], September 21, 1950

PROPOSED FEDERATION OF ERITREA WITH ETHIOPIA

I should like to refer to the compromise proposal for the "federation" of Eritrea with Ethiopia which was worked out among the members of the Interim Committee under the guidance of the chairman, Mr. Muniz.[48] The text of this proposal was contained in Mr. Riddell's telegram No. 604 of August 25th,† copy of which is attached. This proposal, as you know, was almost accepted by the Interim Committee and will almost certainly be reconsidered in its present, or in a slightly altered form in the General Assembly.

2. This proposal seems to be the most likely way of finding a solution for a difficult problem and merits our support. However, it is important, I think, that we realize what seems to me the revolutionary nature of the proposal. A proposal which apparently would settle only a minor problem of the United Nations could set an extremely important precedent. The significance of the programme arises in particular, I think, from paragraph 7 in which it is proposed that the United Nations prescribe a Bill of Rights for residents of Eritrea. In other parts of the proposal, constitutional features are prescribed not only for Eritrea but for Ethiopia as a whole. It is, perhaps, one thing for the United Nations, at the request of the victorious powers, to prescribe a constitution for a former Italian colony but it is going a good deal further to prescribe a constitution, in part at least, for an original member state. In order to understand the nature of what has been done, let us suppose that the opponents of confederation in Newfoundland had appealed to the United Nations and that the General Assembly, in order to achieve an amicable settlement, prescribed a union of Newfoundland with Canada which obliged the Canadian Government to recognize certain fundamental rights in the province of Newfoundland and to set up a particular kind of "federal council". There seems to me little doubt that we should say the action of the Assembly was contrary to Article 2(7) of the Charter.

3. I should not like to suggest that I am necessarily proposing opposition to this proposal because of its revolutionary nature. It seems to me, however, that we should realize what we are doing. When I was sitting in the Interim Committee I endeavoured, on a number of occasions, to raise, with the United Kingdom and United States representatives, the question of the extent to which the General Assembly would be obliged to enforce its will in perpetuity on Ethiopia. They were so much interested in finding a solution that they did not want to pause in order to contemplate the long-range implications of what they were doing. The only representative who seemed to share my anxiety was the Netherlands representative who had clearly in mind the way in which the Indonesian Government had, in a very short time, altered a constitution upon which agreement had been reached with an outside party.

4. It seems to me that we must either recognize that the Assembly is moving well in advance of what were the intentions of the founders at San Francisco, or else they are being hypocritical. When I raised the question with some of my colleagues in the Interim Committee as to whether the Assembly would be obliged to take action if, in future, the Ethiopian Government made constitutional changes contrary to this resolution or whether the Ethiopian Government could, in future, plead its right to take whatever action it wished under Article 2(7), there was a tendency to say that the Assembly could not interfere with a member's desire to alter its own laws. This seems like the commonsense interpretation but if we accept this interpretation then how can we say that we are providing the "federal" solution which firmly guarantees the rights of Eritrean minorities?

J.W. HOLMES

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures pour le chef de la Direction des Nations Unies

Memorandum from Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Head, United Nations Division

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, September 22, 1950

I return to you the memorandum of September 21 on the proposed federation of Eritrea with Ethiopia.

2. I suggest that you should, in consultation with the Legal Division and Miss MacCallum, prepare a teletype to the Canadian Delegation to the Assembly setting forth the problem.

3. I am inclined not to be as concerned as you are over the precedent which is being set, since the precedent is, I think, a pretty narrow one. The Assembly has, I think, an undoubted legal right under the Italian Peace Treaty to prescribe a constitution for Eritrea and to require that Ethiopia accept this constitution in the international instrument transferring Eritrea to Ethiopia. I would also think that the Assembly has a legal right to require Ethiopia to make changes in its own constitution as a quid pro quo for the federation of Eritrea with Ethiopia.

4. Article 2 (7) of the Charter is not, to my mind, inconsistent with this interpretation of the power which the Assembly has been given by the Italian Peace Treaty.

The domestic jurisdiction clause in the Charter merely states that nothing in the Charter authorizes the United Nations to intervene in certain domestic matters. It does not say that the United Nations cannot be given power by international instruments other than the Charter to intervene in domestic affairs.

5. In particular, the domestic jurisdiction clause must be read along with Article 107, which says that nothing in the Charter shall invalidate or preclude action in relation to enemy states, etc.

6. The other point which you raise has, I think, greater substance — that is, the extent to which the General Assembly would be obliged to enforce its will in perpetuity on Ethiopia. I would submit that, no matter how far-reaching are the international obligations which Ethiopia may be required to assume by the Assembly as a condition for the acquisition of Eritrea, the Assembly need not enter into any obligation to enforce its will on Ethiopia. Should Ethiopia not live up to its promises, it will be in default on its international obligations and may be found to be in default by the International Court. In that case Article 94 of the Charter will apply.[49]

305. DEA/50126-40

Note du chef de la Direction européenne pour la Direction des Nations Unies

Memorandum from Head, European Division, to United Nations Division

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 6, 1950

FEDERATION OF ERITREA WITH ETHIOPIA — CONSTITUTIONAL ARRANGEMENTS — FUNCTIONS OF THE UNITED NATIONS ASSEMBLY

The European Division concurs with the interpretation of the Assembly's functions embodied in Mr. Reid's memorandum of September 22, 1950 except in one point made in paragraph 3. It is our understanding that Annex XI of the Italian Peace Treaty does not authorize the Assembly in a legal sense to prescribe a constitution for Eritrea or to require acceptance of the constitution by Ethiopia, although in a general sense this is what members of the Interim Committee have had in mind. What the Italian Peace Treaty did was to refer the question of the disposal of the former Italian colonies to the General Assembly of the United Nations "for a recommendation". The Four Powers agreed "to accept the recommendation and to take appropriate measures for giving effect to it". (The italics are ours).

2. If the Assembly decides to recommend the federation of Eritrea with Ethiopia it appears to us that the appropriate measures for giving effect to the federation plan

[49] Aux termes de l'article 94, section 2, le Conseil de sécurité peut, si nécessaire, prendre des mesures pour appliquer les décisions de la Cour internationale.
Article 94, Section 2 permits the Security Council to take action to enforce judgements of the International Court if necessary.

would have to be undertaken by the United Kingdom as the agent on the spot of the Four Powers. If the Assembly recommended the appointment of a United Nations Commissioner to facilitate the transfer of power and the drafting of a constitution, the United Kingdom would be expected to cooperate with him as one of the "appropriate measures" it has promised to take.

3. It is obvious that if the Assembly adopted a resolution which Ethiopia opposed and refused to help carry out, the United Kingdom would be placed in an impossible position, since measures it might take to put the recommendation into effect would lead to nothing. For argument's sake, however, it might be observed that if the Assembly did adopt a resolution to which interested parties were irreconcilably opposed, the United Kingdom would be obliged to refer the question back to the Assembly for further consideration after trying and failing to carry out the recommendation. The true function of the Assembly, as we see it, is to try to find an agreed solution since this was beyond the capacity of the Four Powers, and to provide a framework within which the agreed solution can be implemented through the adoption of appropriate measures by the United Kingdom Government. If this interpretation is accepted, the Assembly would be remaining within the functions planned for it at San Francisco by the founders of the United Nations.

4. We agree with Mr. Holmes that the proposed federation plan would make extraordinary demands on an independent state which is a member of the United Nations, but it is our feeling that the Assembly ought clearly to be allowed to state the terms on which it would be willing to see Ethiopia enjoy the advantages of a closer political association with Eritrea. We are concerned, however, that nothing in the federal plan proposed by the Assembly should interfere with the success of Emperor Haile Selassie's own measures of reform in Ethiopia itself. It should be possible to avoid this danger if the Assembly draws up its resolution in consultation with Ethiopian representatives. This again points to the importance of securing an agreed solution of the Eritrean problem.

5. It is not likely that during the lifetime of the present Emperor an arrangement for a federal constitution once accepted would be reversed. The first practical difficulty likely to arise is in connection with the Eritrean Bill of Rights, to which Mr. Holmes has drawn special attention. In particular, arrangements to protect the life and property of foreigners will undoubtedly occupy a substantial proportion of the attention of the British military administration, the Ethiopian Government and any United Nations representative who may be appointed to help work out the detailed provisions of the Eritrean constitution. Here again, in our view, it is the function of the Assembly to establish as wide an area of agreement as possible. In this case it would give special attention to Italian interests, which are chiefly involved, as the soundest basis for its recommendation. In this connection it should be remembered that in Ethiopia itself the life and property of Italians have been protected adequately since the war. Although there is no doubt that Italians in Eritrea will feel themselves to be in an exposed position, in practice their problem can perhaps be met by giving the federal authorities some responsibility for maintaining internal security and good order in the entire federal area, as has been proposed in the draft resolution worked out by Muniz and some of his associates in the Interim Committee in consultation with representatives of Ethiopia and Italy.

6. The Assembly will presumably address itself to working out a reasonable basis of federation which Emperor Haile Selassie can accept, including guarantees of the rights of foreign nationals which Italy can accept. The Assembly's recommendation would then be communicated, as we understand it, to the governments of the Four Powers, and the United Nations Commissioner would proceed to Asmara secure in the knowledge that the Four Powers must let the United Kingdom take appropriate measures to put the recommendation into effect.

7. The possible revocation of constitutional rights of foreigners in Eritrea, which Mr. Holmes rightly asks us to consider at this stage, could not take place until after the withdrawal of the British administration and the United Nations Commissioner. If any such move were attempted after their withdrawal and Italian settlers in Eritrea suffered abuse or discrimination, it would be open to Italy to take the matter up with the federal authorities in Addis Ababa through normal diplomatic channels, in the same way that Italy would discuss with the authorities in Belgrade any threat to Italian nationals in Croatia. We are inclined to think, however, that the Addis Ababa authorities would not in fact attempt to tamper with the "human rights" clauses of the Federal Act, though it is quite within the realm of possibility that in a country as primitive as Eritrea these clauses might not always be satisfactorily observed. The practical consideration for Ethiopia is that as a backward state its own security is largely based on the goodwill of the United Nations. At least a part of this indispensable goodwill would be dissipated if Italy, failing to get satisfaction for its nationals through diplomatic negotiations, were to refer any question of the mistreatment of Italian nationals in Eritrea to the Assembly under Article 10 of the Charter, or to the International Court of Justice as suggested in Mr. Reid's memorandum.

8. In these circumstances the answer to the question Mr. Holmes has raised seems to us to be (a) that the Assembly must make every effort to find a practical solution of the Eritrean problem on the basis of agreement between the parties concerned, (b) that it should encourage the parties themselves to assume as much responsibility as possible for finding a suitable way of settling the problem of Eritrea, and (c) that the Assembly itself should meanwhile make no pretension to enjoy the right of coercion, which is bestowed upon it neither by the Italian Peace Treaty nor by the Charter.

AD HOC POLITICAL COMMITTEE: DISCUSSION ON LIBYA

Mr. Ford. Debates in the Ad Hoc Political Committee on Libya revealed a conflict of opinion concerning the policies of the Administering Powers (France and the United Kingdom) and the United Nations Commissioner (Mr. Adrian Pelt) in carrying out the terms of the 1949 General Assembly resolution, which called for the establishment of an independent Libya by January 1, 1952. Delegates from the Arab States, from India, Pakistan and the Soviet Union criticised the Administering Powers and the United Nations Commissioner for pursuing policies of "colonialism" in the area, for obstructing Libyan unity and attaching parts of the Fezzan to Algeria and Tunisia, and for failing to carry out the provisions of the 1949 Assembly resolution regarding Libyan sovereignty and independence. The Canadian Delegate, in view of the acrimonious nature of the debate, has endeavoured to steer a moderate path, and said, in his statement, that he could not share the doubts expressed in connection with the implementation of the 1949 Assembly resolution. The Canadian Delegation abstained on a controversial vote upon the request of the Chairman of the United Nations Council for Libya to be heard by the Committee, and acted as co-sponsor of a moderately worded resolution expressing confidence in the Commissioner and calling for economic and financial aid for Libya.

Also before the Committee is a United Kingdom resolution in connection with the transfer of Italian state and para-statal property to Libya; a Soviet resolution calling for Libyan unity and the withdrawal of foreign troops; a joint resolution introduced by certain Arab States, Indonesia and Pakistan, criticising the Commissioner and the Administering Powers and calling for the establishment of an elected provisional Libyan government by March 1, 1951, to take over power from the Administering Powers; and finally, a United States resolution concerning the establishment of a constituent assembly and provisional government. It is expected that the Committee will vote on these various resolutions early this week. (Confidential)

The General Assembly

Having received the reports of the United Nations Commissioner in Libya, prepared in consultation with the Council for Libya, and of the Administering Powers, submitted in accordance with General Assembly Resolution 289 A (IV);

Having noted in particular the belief expressed by the Commissioner that the aim of the General Assembly, that Libya should become an independent and sovereign State will be attained within the time limit prescribed with the continuing cooperation and co-ordination of the activities of the Administering Powers toward that end;

Taking account of the progress being made by the representatives of the inhabitants of Cyrenaica, Tripolitania, and the Fezzan meeting in their Committee of twenty-one regarding the establishment of a National Assembly to determine a constitution for Libya, including the form of Government in accordance with paragraph 3 of the above-mentioned resolution;

Having noted the statements on the above-mentioned reports regarding the substantial needs of Libya for technical and financial assistance both before and after independence;

Takes note of the reports of the United Nations Commissioner in Libya and those of the Administering Powers;

Expresses confidence that the United Nations Commissioner in Libya, aided and advised by the Council for Libya, will continue effectively to discharge his functions under General Assembly Resolution 289 A (IV) toward the achievement of the independence and unity of Libya pursuant to that resolution;

1. Recommends to the Administering Powers that, in their administration of the respective territories of Libya and in co-operation with the United Nations Commissioner in Libya, they press forward with the formation of Governmental institutions for Libya in accordance with the wishes of the people of Libya, in order to facilitate the establishment of an independent and sovereign Libya as soon as possible and in any case not later than 1st January 1952, and with further co-ordination of their activities to that end;

2. Urges the Economic and Social Council and the specialized agencies of the United Nations as well as member Governments, having regard for the special responsibilities of the United Nations in respect of Libya, to continue to assist that country through technical and financial assistance to develop a sound administrative system and viable economy, offering the prospect of economic and social progress;

3. Reaffirms its recommendation that, upon its establishment as an independent State, Libya shall be admitted to the United Nations in accordance with Article 4 of the Charter. Ends.

Following is text of draft resolution jointly introduced yesterday morning by the delegations of Egypt, Indonesia, Iraq, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen, Begins:

Whereas the United Nations on 21st November 1949, resolved that Libya shall be constituted a united independent sovereign State;

Whereas under said resolution the administering powers in co-operation with the United Nations Commissioner were directed to: "(b) Administer the territories for the purpose of assisting in the establishment of Libyan unity and independence, co-operate in the formation of Governmental institutions and co-ordinate their activities to this end,"

Whereas on the consideration of the reports of the United Nations Commissioner and the administering powers and the information supplied by the Chairman of the Council for Libya, it appears that appropriate and adequate measures have not been taken to ensure Libyan unity;

Whereas the steps necessary for the transfer of power to an independent Libyan Government were to have been initiated immediately after the said resolution of the General Assembly and the transfer must be completed by a date not later than 1st January 1952; and

Whereas adequate measures to ensure the realisation of the objectives referred to in paragraph 4 above do not appear to have been taken;

The General Assembly therefore

1. Calls upon the authorities concerned to take all steps necessary to ensure the early, full and effective implementation of the resolution of 21st November 1949, and particularly to safeguard the unity of Libya and the early transfer of power to an independent Libyan Government, and, further,

2. Recommends,

(a) That a National Assembly duly representative of the inhabitants of Libya shall be convened as early as possible and in any case not later than the 1st January 1951.

(b) That the National Assembly shall set up a provisional Government of Libya, responsible to the Assembly, to which shall be transferred all powers at present exercised by the administering powers; and

(c) That the provisional Government shall be set up as early as possible and not later than 1st March 1951. Ends.

TELEGRAM 158 New York, October 16, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

My teletypes Nos. 135 and 145 of October 13th and 14th. Libya.

1. As a result of informal conversations on initiative of United States delegation, sponsors of two draft resolutions contained in my teletypes under reference agreed to discuss possibility of reconciling their points of view. Accordingly, on motion of Ecuadorian delegation, debate was adjourned on October 14th, and sponsors met in closed session. At suggestion of Syrian delegation, representative of Soviet Union, who had introduced first draft resolution on Libya, was invited to participate in discussions. Text of Soviet draft resolution is contained in my immediately following telegram.†

2. Soviet resolution was taken as basis of initial talks. Arab reaction to first paragraph of this resolution was not unfavourable. Syrian and Iraqi delegations contended, in fact, that the word "single" did not, in their view, go far enough. What they actually desired was a unitarian State. At the same time, they realized that this could not be imposed upon the Libyans by the Assembly and would be in direct contravention of Article 3 of Assembly resolution of 1949.

3. Canadian delegation objected to "single" because of ambiguity of term, which might subsequently be interpreted as recommendation to establish Libyan State on unitary basis. We also felt that a term that did not occur in the original Assembly resolution on Libya should not now be employed. Our general line of argument was that the substantive resolution on Libya had been adopted by the Assembly last year. The Assembly could only reaffirm it at this stage, but it could hardly alter or modify it. Mr. Pelt as well as Chairman of Council for Libya agreed fully with this line of argument and expressed their fear that the introduction of new terms at the present juncture would be more likely to impede than promote the aims embodied in the 1949 resolution.

4. As for withdrawal of military personnel from Libya within three months, Muslim delegations indicated their support for this provision subject to modification of time limit. Egyptian and Indonesian delegates, on the other hand, did not object to maintenance of military bases, provided this met with consent of Libyan Government. Egyptians argued further that these bases had been established in order to safeguard peace in the area, and inasmuch as problem of effective means of maintaining peace was being discussed concurrently in first committee, we should not adopt any resolution which might prejudge decisions eventually to be reached. When we suggested to Syrians after meeting that Egypt was probably anxious to have assurance of Western protection as long as bases were not on Egyptian soil, Syrian delegate agreed. Nevertheless, he voiced his surprise at incongruity of Egyptian approach to problem and told us confidentially that Salah Al-Din Bey[50] did not share views propounded by Egyptian delegate, and he would seek clarification of Egyptian opinion on this point.

5. Canadian delegation made it clear that it would be unrealistic to ask administering Powers to continue to be responsible for security of Libya and, at the same time, adopt resolution ordering them to withdraw their military personnel.

6. While Arab delegations did their best to show that they were in sympathy with motives behind Soviet resolution, they considered that such a resolution, which had previously been rejected by Assembly, had no chance of being adopted this year.

[50] Mohamed Salah-el-Din Bey, délégué permanent de l'Égypte auprès des Nations Unies.
Mohamed Salah-el-Din Bey, Permanent Delegate of Egypt to United Nations.

They accordingly felt there would be little advantage in incorporating substance of Soviet recommendations in any compromise resolution which might be agreed upon.

7. Points of view have now crystallized. Muslim delegations object to paragraph 3 of preamble of our resolution and to paragraph 1 of operative section. They maintain that a possible joint resolution must contain no reference to the Committee of Twenty-one, which is constituted on an undemocratic basis. They also consider that the phrase "governmental institutions for Libya" fails to take account of the Assembly's recommendations that there should be a united Libya and, in that respect, would tend to diminish rather than promote the idea of unity.

8. On our part we are pressing for the deletion from the seven-Power resolution of any suggestion to the effect that appropriate steps had not been taken to implement the resolution passed by the General Assembly last year. We have also voiced our objections to the unrealistic deadline stipulated for the creation of a provisional Government, as well as to the unpalatable insinuation that Libyan unity is already in need of being "safeguarded".

9. United States delegation has now circulated a possible compromise resolution which takes account of the differences of approach emerging from last Saturday's meeting.

10. The three groups are to meet again on October 16th when agreement will probably be reached. Soviet delegation, however, is unlikely to co-sponsor revised draft resolution.

11. Assumption in final paragraph of article on page 22 of New York Times of October 15th is incorrect. There is nothing in compromise resolution which, either explicitly or implicitly, would suggest that Libyan National Assembly is to be elected or that its composition would be on basis of proportional representation.

TELEGRAM 176 New York, October 18, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

My teletype No. 158 of 16th October. Libya.

2. Informal consultations between two groups of sponsors of resolutions on Libya resulted in agreement on October 17th. Text of compromise resolution, which has now been submitted to Committee, is contained in my immediately following teletype.

3. Canadian, Chilean, Ecuadorian and Greek delegations worked in close cooperation with United Nations Commissioner throughout. Egyptian Chairman of Council for Libya, contrary to previous expectations, displayed complete impartiality in his attitude and, on most questions, supported views of United Nations Commissioner.

4. You will note that critical references to work of Commissioner and cooperation of Administering Powers have been deleted. Mr. Pelt considered that the term "increasing" in paragraph 3 of the preamble did not imply any overt censure of the activities of the Administering Powers and followed logically from the substance of the remarks contained in paragraph 258 of his report.

5. We eventually accepted, in paragraph 1 of the preamble, the phrase "a united, independent and sovereign state". Despite the objections already voiced by the delegations of the United Kingdom, Australia and Belgium, we cannot admit that this terminology goes beyond the meaning of last year's resolution on Libya. Paragraph 10(b) of that resolution contains an explicit endorsement of the principle of Libyan unity. Moreover we considered that the term "united" was far less ambiguous in connotation than the word "single" which the co-sponsors of the Muslim resolution would have preferred.

6. Paragraph 4 of the preamble and operative part of the new joint resolution represent a compromise between the views of the United Nations Commissioner, who insisted that some reference to technical and financial assistance must be retained, and the sponsors of the seven-power resolution who felt that any such reference might entitle member Governments of the United Nations to enter into special economic relationships with the new Libyan state or, alternately, that the new state might be turned into what would virtually amount to a territory under United Nations trusteeship.

7. We found that, unless we agreed to make some concessions in regard to the target dates included in paragraph 3 of the operative part, no compromise would have been possible. Mr. Pelt informed us that, in any case, January 1st, 1951, represented a conservative target date for the establishment of a National Assembly, which will probably come into existence toward the end of November. As for the date of the establishment of a provisional Government, you will note that it has been recommended on a tentative basis only. However, we are still of the opinion that any recommendation to the Libyan National Assembly to establish a provisional Government does not accord with the spirit of paragraph 3 of the Assembly resolution of 1949.

The Muslim States have made three reservations regarding the new resolution:

1. The Provisional Government should be set up whether or not the National Assembly comes into being.

2. The provisional Government should be responsible to the National Assembly if it is established by that body. (This would seem to prejudge the prerogatives granted the Libyan people to decide their own form of Government. It is also somewhat unrealistic in view of the fact that this National Assembly will, in reality, be a Constituent Assembly, which will draft a Constitution and an Electoral Law, and then dissolve itself.)

3. That some provision for the gradual withdrawal of foreign troops and complete evacuation before January 1st, 1952, should be included in the new resolution.

Our compromise resolution is likely to command substantial support, including Latin American and Arab delegations. Yugoslavia has already come out in favour of it, and preliminary remarks by Soviet delegate would tend to indicate that Soviet Union might abstain rather than vote against it. We feel that it would be particularly unfortunate if so-called "Colonial" Powers, by opposing joint draft resolution, lent substance to the charges levelled against them in the course of the general debate.

My immediately preceding teletype. Libya.
Following is the text of the compromise resolution drafted jointly by the delegations of Canada, Chile, Ecuador, Egypt, Greece, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Yemen: Text begins:

"The General Assembly,

Having resolved in its Resolution 289 (IV) of 21st November 1949, that Libya shall be constituted a united independent and sovereign State;

Having noted the reports of the United Nations Commissioner in Libya, prepared in consultation with the Council for Libya, and of the Administering Powers, submitted in accordance with General Assembly Resolution 289 (IV), as well as the statements of the United Nations Commissioner and the representatives of the Council for Libya;

Having noted in particular the confidence expressed by the Commissioner that the aim of the General Assembly, namely, that Libya should become an independent and sovereign State, will be attained within the time limit prescribed, with the increasing co-operation of the Administering Powers with the United Nations Commissioner and the mutual co-ordination of their activities toward that end;

Having noted the statements in the above-mentioned report of the Commissioner regarding the needs of Libya for technical and financial assistance both before and after independence, if so requested by the Government of Libya;

1. Expresses confidence that the United Nations Commissioner in Libya, aided and guided by the advice of the members of the Council for Libya, will take the necessary steps to discharge his functions toward the achievement of the independence and unity of Libya pursuant to that resolution;

2. Calls upon the authorities concerned to take all steps necessary to ensure the early, full and effective implementation of the above-mentioned resolution of 21st November 1949 and particularly the realization of the unity of Libya and the transfer of power to an independent Libyan Government; and, further

(a) That a National Assembly duly representative of the inhabitants of Libya shall be convened as early as possible, and in any case before 1st January 1951;

(b) That this National Assembly shall establish a Provisional Government of Libya as early as possible, bearing in mind 1st April 1951 as the target date;

(c) That powers shall be progressively transferred to the Provisional Government by the Administering Powers in a manner which will ensure that by 1st January 1952, all powers at present exercised by the Administering Powers shall have been transferred to the duly constituted Libyan Government;

(d) That the United Nations Commissioner aided and guided by the advice of the members of the Council for Libya shall proceed immediately to draw up a programme in cooperation with the Administering Powers for the transfer of power as provided in clause (c) above.

4. Urges the Economic and Social Council and the specialized agencies of the United Nations and the Secretary-General of the United Nations to extend to Libya such technical and financial assistance as it may request in order to establish a sound basis for economic and social progress.

5. Reaffirms its recommendation that, upon its establishment as an independent State, Libya be admitted to the United Nations in accordance with Article 4 of the Charter." Text ends.

My teletype No. 177 of October 18th. Libya.

Discussion of Libyan item ended on October 19th. Soviet resolution and joint draft resolution of the thirteen Powers were then put to the vote. Soviet resolution, as a whole, was rejected by a vote of 13 in favour, 38 against, and 7 abstentions. Joint draft resolution, of which Canada was co-sponsor, was adopted, as a whole, by a vote of 53 in favour, 1 against (France), and 5 abstentions (Soviet bloc).

2. A series of amendments to the thirteen-Power resolution, which had been introduced at the last moment, were withdrawn before the voting began. Most serious of these would have been Australian amendment proposing that the word "one" be substituted for "united" in the first paragraph of the preamble. Syrian delegate told us informally that, in the event that Australian amendment were adopted, he would dissociate himself from joint draft resolution and reopen whole issue. Australian delegation was, therefore, given oral assurance that the term "united" was not intended in any way to prejudge the question of whether the Libyan state was to be constituted along unitary or federal lines.

3. Amendments proposed by Argentina and United States were not of a substantive nature and would have raised no difficulties. Pakistan amendment would have added the words "responsible to that Assembly" after the words "provisional Government of Libya" in paragraph 3(b) of operative section. It would also have added, at the end of this clause, the words: "provided that if the National Assembly is unable to set up a provisional Government by 31st March 1951, the Commissioner, advised and guided by the Council for Libya, shall at once proceed to set up a provisional Government in consultation with the National Assembly". We had argued this point at length in the drafting committee and, along with the United Nations Commissioner, had stated our firm opposition to the principles embodied in the Pakistan amendment.

4. Most controversial amendment introduced was that of Israel which would have altered the first line of paragraph 3(a) to read "that a National Assembly duly representative of all the inhabitants of Libya ...". This raised the delicate problem of minority representation in the National Assembly which, we felt, should be divorced from our resolution since it was bound to jeopardize the principle of Libyan unity. We asked the Israelis to reconsider this amendment in view of the statements made earlier by the United Nations Commissioner, pointing especially to the recent decision of the Committee of 21 to the effect that Libyan Jews would not be considered in the category of "non-national minorities". Inasmuch as it might have been difficult for Latin Americans to vote against a provision which clearly would benefit the Italian minority, we welcomed particularly the withdrawal of this amendment.

5. Voting indicated that joint draft resolution represented maximum basis of compromise between divergent points of view set forth in course of discussion on this item. United Kingdom voted in favour of resolution paragraph by paragraph and as a whole. We consider that French delegation unwise in opposing resolution, particularly in view of sharp criticism of French administration in Fezzan which had been voiced by majority of delegations. French abstention, even on paragraphs reiterating Assembly resolution of 1949, would appear to cast some doubts on French readiness to co-operate in full and effective implementation of Libyan independence and sovereignty.

Further debate on this item is now in progress in ad hoc Political Committee. While the delegations of South Africa, New Zealand, Burma, Liberia, France and Norway have suggested in their statements that a solution along federal lines would, in principle, be acceptable to them, there is some indication now that the proponents of independence for Eritrea are gaining strength.

2. We spoke to Stafford and Noyes on November 10th, expressing some anxiety as to the trend the debate was taking. The Soviet Union as well as Iraq and Saudi Arabia had come out in favour of Eritrean independence, and two draft resolutions along these lines, one by the U.S.S.R. and one by Iraq, had already been submitted for the consideration of the Committee. The text of the Iraqi draft resolution is contained in my immediately following teletype.†

3. At the same time it is, of course, common knowledge that, in conformity with Italian wishes the majority of the Latin-American delegations would be prepared to support any feasible resolution under which Eritrea might be granted independence.

4. Those delegates who have already spoken in favour of Eritrean independence adduced the argument that the people of Eritrea had the right to self-determination. This right would be violated if the General Assembly arrogated to itself the competence to deprive the Eritrean people of their freedom, either by incorporation in Ethiopia or by partition, which would be tantamount to a process of dual annexation. On the basis of this argument, the delegates of Iraq and Saudi Arabia maintained that no final decision on the fate of Eritrea should be reached until steps had been taken to ascertain the will of the local population.

5. The fundamental misconception which seemed to lie at the root of the Arab line of argument was that, in the case where a people is free to determine its own political future, it will of necessity decide in favour of sovereign integrity and independence. Even more misleading was the Iraqi argument to the effect that the poverty of a country should not be used by the international community as a reason for withholding from that country its national freedom. Both these arguments are, of course, based on the premise that Eritrea is and has always been geographically, economically, and demographically, a distinct territorial entity and, as such, is entitled to sovereignty and independence. It may be for this reason that the Iraqi draft resolution is so closely modelled upon the General Assembly resolution providing for establishment of a Libyan State.

6. There can be little doubt that the adoption of the Iraqi draft resolution would tip the scales heavily in favour of eventual independence for Eritrea, even though Mr. Jamali expressed his delegation's preference for a federal solution. Moreover, there would seem to be considerable danger in protracting the present state of uncertainty in Eritrea until January 1, 1953, as envisaged under the first operative paragraph of the Iraqi resolution. But it cannot be denied that the combinations of the alternatives of independence and federation, as well as the transfer of responsibility for a final decision to the people of Eritrea, will win a certain amount of support for the proposals submitted by the delegation of Iraq.

7. Stafford and Noyes have expressed the hope that negotiations with the Italians and Ethiopians will progress sufficiently over the week-end to make it possible for interested delegations to put forward an acceptable compromise resolution along federal lines by early next week.

Note de la Direction des Nations Unies pour le sous-secrétaire d'État suppléant aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from United Nations Division to Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], November 13, 1950

ERITREA

I have shortened and revised the telegram to the Delegation on Eritrea, as requested by you Friday night.

2. You will recall that Mr. Holmes first raised the question of the problems involved in a federation of Eritrea with Ethiopia, when this question arose during the discussions in the Interim Committee last July. Since then the question has been passed back and forth between this Division, European and Legal. The telegram which went up to you on Friday, a revision of which is now attached for your signature, if you approve, was the consensus of our views on this subject.

3. You queried the substance of paragraph 3. This is, however, the considered opinion of Legal Division, by which they stand.

4. In view of the fact that a decision on the fate of Eritrea must be taken by the Assembly, the qualms of conscience about the effects of federation with Ethiopia seem to be somewhat unrealistic, and federation is clearly the only acceptable solution, as indicated by telegram No. 372 of November 13† which has just come in. Nevertheless, this information was asked for, and I suppose it should be supplied to the Delegation.

R.A.D. FORD

P.S. There is a certain amount of duplication with the commentary article; but the questions raised in the telegram are treated in a different context from the commentary article. To shorten the telegram more would make it unintelligible.

CONFIDENTIAL

Your teletype No. 348 of November 9, 1950.† Eritrea.

1. In giving further study to the question of Eritrea we have considered recently the position we should take in connection with three questions which may possibly be raised during the debate in the Ad Hoc Political Committee. This is intended for your background information only.

2. The first question is whether the Assembly has the right to recommend a federation plan which would involve alteration of the constitutional arrangements of Ethiopia, an independent state and member of the United Nations. Certain delegations may feel that the federation proposal comes a little too close to setting a precedent of interference in the domestic affairs of a member state.

3. The argument would presumably relate only to the psychological effect of the federation proposal. It could not be argued that in any legal sense the Assembly would be interfering in Ethiopia's domestic affairs, since Annex XI of the Italian peace treaty, under which the Assembly has been asked to consider the disposal of Eritrea, provides only for an Assembly "recommendation". There is no question either of a "decision" by the Assembly or of the imposition of the Assembly's will on one of its own members. The point at issue is whether it would be wise for the Assembly to recommend in this instance that one of its members should alter the domestic arrangements it has made under the terms of its own constitution.

4. We consider it permissible for the Assembly to make such a recommendation in this particular case because Ethiopia has asked to be allowed to take over a territory it has not recently controlled and the Assembly is accordingly bound to make known the terms on which it would be willing to recommend the closer political association of Eritrea with Ethiopia. The latter will be at perfect liberty to refuse the conditions suggested, in which case some other disposition of the territory would presumably be recommended.

5. The second question we have considered is the degree of responsibility which would rest on the Assembly if rights of Italian nationals in Eritrea were not properly safeguarded after federation. This may be a matter of some practical importance, since the possibility of continuing political disorders cannot be ruled out entirely in view of the sharp cleavage of opinion which still prevails in Eritrea over the question of relations with Ethiopia. In a country as backward as Eritrea, moreover, it is seldom the case that rights as far-reaching as those enumerated in Article 7 of the proposed federal act are fully or uninterruptedly enjoyed by foreigners at all times.

6. Since Ethiopia has not accepted the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice, it seems to us that the only course open to Italy, if it failed to obtain satisfaction through normal diplomatic channels in cases relating to the treatment of Italian nationals in Eritrea, would be to refer the matter to the Assembly under Article 10 of the Charter. It would then be for the Assembly to recommend the course which it thought best. In this connection it might be pointed out that the Ethiopian government is fully aware of the degree to which the security of the Ethiopian Empire is dependent on the goodwill of members of the United Nations. It also understands the extent to which this goodwill would be dissipated if there were any wilful neglect of the provisions of the federal act governing the rights of residents of Eritrea.

7. The last question we have considered relates to the responsibility which would rest on the Assembly to intervene if Ethiopia should try to use the proposed federal arrangement merely as a stepping-stone to the complete incorporation of Eritrea. It is our view that in this matter the Assembly should make no pretension to the right of enforcement. There is nothing in the Italian peace treaty or in the Charter which gives the Assembly that right. The Assembly's best contribution can be made by seeking an agreed solution, since the will to carry out the proposed federal arrangements will play a most important part in assuring their long-term efficacy. We believe it would be appropriate also for the Assembly to name a United Nations Commissioner to aid the interested parties in drawing up the constitution for Eritrea and to facilitate agreement among them. He would not be endowed with executive authority, however, since the legal responsibility for the actual transfer of power would rest on British officials in the territory, the United Kingdom being the sole representative there of the Four Powers who have agreed under Annex XI of the Italian peace treaty to take appropriate measures for giving effect to the Assembly's resolution.

8. What has led us to give special thought to the Assembly's position in case Ethiopia were some time to annex Eritrea outright has been the fact that full incorporation is what the majority of Eritreans apparently want. Sooner or later they are likely to feel a certain temptation to take matters into their own hands. We are not entirely happy, of course, about backing a federation proposal which is not what the majority of the Eritreans want. We are doing so for the reasons outlined in Holmes' statement of July 14 before the Interim Committee. In particular we believe that both those who want independence for Eritrea as a separate state and those who would prefer to become independent through union with Ethiopia would be likely to regard federation as the least unattractive alternative if their first choice could not be realized.

9. We have had no further word from the Italian Ambassador about his government's position on this question and know nothing about the present attitude of the Italians at Lake Success. If at any time it seems likely to be helpful, however, you might let the Italians know informally that we have always felt the most logical solution would be the incorporation in Ethiopia of the portion of Eritrea where the great majority of the inhabitants desire it, the people of Western Eritrea being given a subsequent opportunity to choose between incorporation in Eritrea and incorporation in the Sudan; though we have not advocated this because of the impossibility of securing the requisite support in the Assembly. If the Italians understood that Canada, along with other friends of Italy, might feel it necessary to fall back on the proposal made by the Norwegian member of the Eritrean Commission in the event that the federation plan were not to be accepted, possibly the Italians might find new merit in the compromise proposal which we have offered to support partly for their sake. We leave it to your discretion to decide the timing of such a suggestion, or whether it would be useful to make it at all.

11. M. Léger. The Ad Hoc Political Committee adopted on November 25, by a vote of 38 to 14 with 8 abstentions, the draft resolution for federation of Eritrea with Ethiopia which Canada sponsored jointly with 13 other member states.

12. The Committee defeated a Soviet resolution calling for the establishment of Eritrea immediately as an independent state and a Polish resolution providing for the creation of an independent Eritrean state after three years of administration by a council of 6 members composed of two indigenous Eritreans, a resident of Eritrea of European origin and representatives of two Arab states and Ethiopia. The Committee also defeated a draft resolution offered by Pakistan, the purpose of which was to establish Eritrean independence with United Nations aid by a process similar to that which is being employed in Libya.

13. A draft resolution offered by Iraq commanded the support of 21 members of the Committee but did not secure majority approval. Its purpose was to allow the Eritreans themselves to decide whether their country should be federated with Ethiopia or established as an independent state. A National Assembly would make this decision not later than July 1, 1951. Although the feature of self-determination embodied in the Iraqi proposal appealed to a large number of delegations, it was believed that the target date was quite unrealistic and there was some doubt as to whether the Eritrean people would be able to reach a decision in view of their political immaturity and the sharp division of opinion among politically conscious groups. Many of the Committee members, whose first choice was to support the principle of self-determination, voted in favour of the federation proposal after the Iraqi draft resolution had been defeated. 317. DEA/50219-A-40

Document de travail pour le Comité consultatif sur l'énergie atomique

Working Paper for Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], March 18, 1950

THE INTERNATIONAL CONTROL OF ATOMIC ENERGY

At the last meeting of the Panel, on February 1, it was agreed that the Panel should at its next meeting begin to take stock of our present situation, to review our stand on the international control of atomic energy and to try to re-examine the deadlock as objectively as possible in the light of our appraisal of the political, military, and technical factors that now apply, or are likely to apply, during the next four or five years.

2. It must be admitted from the outset that this is a task of doubtful utility. The debate on atomic energy control ranges over so many subjects of such importance that it is as difficult to know where to stop as to know where to begin in an effort to get to the root of the matter. In an introductory study, presented as a basis for Panel discussion, we are necessarily limited to a cursory, and no doubt rather fragmentary platitudinous and superficial examination of some of the problems that must be faced if we have any hope left at all of reaching agreement with the Russians, sooner or later, on the relaxation of international tension of which perhaps the atomic bomb is a prime cause, as it is certainly the most publicized cause.

3. For simplicity of presentation, and in order to avoid any suggestion of prejudging the issues involved, the most satisfactory approach to discussion may be by means of raising various questions, first on procedures that might open the way for genuine negotiations, and then as to what room for manoeuvre, if any, we may have in negotiating an international agreement that could not only provide us with an acceptable degree of security from surprise atomic attack, but would also provide the Russians with an acceptable degree of freedom to develop atomic energy for peaceful purposes, especially for power.

4. Before turning to a more detailed examination of procedures and plans, however, it might be wise, first of all, to try to project our thinking against a time graph of military power. So many of the questions that can be raised may have one answer this year, but quite a different answer two or three years from now. To the extent that we can foresee a diminishing value in atomic weapons as a deterrent, we can forecast when the conclusion of an international agreement on atomic control will become most desirable from our point of view; and we can also estimate the probable Soviet calculation, and from that guess when the prospects of an international control agreement will likely be best. This will involve what is primarily a military calculation, but the following propositions may serve to lead into the subject.

The Military Prospect — 1950-55

5. It seems probable that neither side will deliberately embark on a major war during the next six years, because neither side could be sure of a rapid victory and neither side could ever hope that, in the course of a long struggle, the desolation of all disputed territories, including the U.S. and Soviet homelands, would make the possibility of ultimate victory worth the price. Nevertheless, granted the nature of Soviet imperialism, the risk of an accidental war remains and both sides have already shown their determination to build up armed forces capable not only of defensive deployment but of the most grievous forms of offensive operations. An armaments race is on, and is likely to reach a peak about 1954. By that time Soviet deficiencies in long-range bombers will have been overcome, and the deficiencies of Western Europe reduced — if our performance lives up to our North Atlantic plans — to the point where we should be able to defend most of Western Europe. Before 1953 it is doubtful that a foothold on the continent of Europe could be maintained for more than a few months in the event of a full-scale Russian attack: all we could do effectively would be to carry an atomic attack against Soviet industrial and administrative centres.

6. Although we are pitifully weak in Europe today, we still have, on the Western side, a great margin of superiority in atomic weapons — in numbers, quality, and ability to deliver — even without the hydrogen bomb. We may confidently expect to maintain that margin, at least the margin in numbers and ability to deliver. The strategic value of our stockpile, however, will diminish long before the Soviet stockpile reaches the proportions of ours. It will begin to diminish as soon as the Russians are capable of delivering by sea or air, half a dozen bombs on U.S. cities: it will have diminished close to the zero point as soon as the Russians are capable of delivering ten times that many. The first capability, the Russians may achieve by the end of this year: the second, by the middle of 1954, when the Soviet atomic stockpile may number as many as ... [sic] bombs, according to recent U.S. intelligence estimates which the U.K. authorities consider may be somewhat exaggerated. At any rate, whether in 1954 or 1955, our present estimates would indicate that the Russians will have a large enough stockpile and good enough long-range bombers to be able to retaliate in kind against the continental United States with very damaging and possible critical results, if the U.S. were to use atomic bombs. Moreover, although the U.S.S.R. may present industrial targets that are more concentrated than those in the United States, their peoples might prove better able to endure the horrors and privations of atomic war than the peoples of the more civilized Western cities.

7. The atomic bomb will then have become a double-edged deterrent, both sides fearing to use it, like gas in the last war. But unlike gas, a surprise atomic attack on a large scale could be crippling, and the aggressor's temptation to resort to such a gamble at the outset would therefore be strong, even if the aggressor knew that he possessed the smaller stockpile or was weaker in other respects. If the hydrogen bomb is developed, the temptation to use atomic weapons first will be increased tenfold or a hundredfold, until, at times of acute international tension, it will become almost irresistible.

8. If this line of argument is valid, a time will come within the next four or five years when it will be in the interests of the United States — and indeed of all the Western Powers — to recognize that the Bomb favours not simply the side with the largest stockpile but the side that would be ready to use it as the opening stroke in an aggressive war. In other words, in the balance of world power, the Bomb will then count more heavily for the Russians than for the West.

9. From this conclusion, three important propositions follow:

(i) that during the next three years the West must build up its strength in conventional weapons and forces-in-being to the point that Western power will not necessarily match Soviet power plane for plane and tank for tank, but will be sufficient to withstand a war in which atomic weapons might not be used; for, as the Soviet stockpile rises, the value of our stockpile as a deterrent will rapidly decline, forcing us to build our power once again upon conventional weapons and forces;

(ii) that by 1953 it would be in our interest to have in full operation an international atomic control agreement;[51] and

(iii) that, as it will take two or three years to put anything like the present majority U.N. plan[52] into full effect, we should recommence serious negotiations with the Russians as soon as a way can be found to bring them to a conference disposed to negotiate and not simply to use it as a forum for "peace" propaganda.

10. In concluding this section, one further proposition, of a more philosophical than military mould, may be advanced. The Soviet atomic explosion last summer did not invalidate the majority plan nor the procedures whereby we have been seeking to negotiate it, but, together with Communist advances, in the Far East, the strategic balance has been altered in favour of the Soviet Union. The United States, so long as it had a monopoly of atomic weapons, held the balance of power comparatively cheaply. A U.S. hydrogen bomb monopoly, if achieved, would probably not give more than a year's respite or at most two years; then the Russians would, we may confidently expect, have it too. The balance will then come to depend on the far more costly build-up of ordinary forces — a cost so great it will have to be

[52] Le Plan de la majorité préconisait la création d'une autorité internationale de développement de l'énergie atomique pour contrôler l'utilisation de l'énergie atomique à des fins pacifiques. Cet organisme international devait aussi être chargé de surveiller la destruction des bombes atomiques et de mettre fin à la fabrication de nouvelles armes atomiques. Appelé d'abord le Plan Baruch en l'honneur du représentant des États-Unis qui l'a soumis à la Commission de l'énergie atomique des Nations Unies en 1946, Bernard Baruch, il fut renommé le Plan de la majorité pour refléter l'appui majoritaire qu'il reçut lors de 3e assemblée générale en 1948.
The Majority Plan called for the creation of an International Atomic Development Authority to oversee the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes. This international agency would also supervise the destruction of atomic bombs and halt the manufacture of new atomic weapons. Originally called the Baruch Plan after the American representative who presented it to the U.N. Atomic Energy Commission in 1946, Bernard Baruch, it was subsequently labelled the Majority Plan to acknowledge the widespread support it garnered at the 3rd General Assembly in 1948.

reckoned not only in terms of lowering our standards of living but of cutting into the fibre of our democratic liberties. In the long haul, a dictatorship can clearly stand these strains more readily than a democracy. Despite superiority in atomic weapons, we of the democracies have more to lose than the Russians if some sort of modus vivendi on the major issues and points of friction is not reached, including, as an essential part of any such agreement, provisions not only to control atomic energy but to scale down armaments.

Procedures

11. Indeed, from the records of the U.N. Atomic Energy Commission for these past four years, it is perfectly plain that the Russians have not been trying to reach agreement. They have taken the "Baruch plan" merely as a target for propaganda, while avoiding any detailed exposition of their own sketchy counter proposals for control by means of "periodic and special" inspection. It may be that the Russians have been waiting until they could break the U.S. monopoly and negotiate on more equal terms. If so, the last General Assembly showed no sign of it. It seems quite possible that the Russians hope to build up a small stockpile and let the West outrun their economic strength in an armaments race. Soviet calculations have for some time been predicting the economic collapse of the United States. So long as they continue to count on it, they need not run the risks of an international agreement on atomic energy which would open up their country to Western inspectors. If this is true, the prospects of reaching any major agreement with the Russians by means of any sort of procedures, however ingenious, are pretty slim.

12. While this may be true, it may not be the whole truth. The Russians have traditionally shown a readiness to expand when they could, but an equal readiness to recognize their limitations when confronted with military strength. George Kennan, in his recent article (published in this month's Reader's Digest, and the Department of State Bulletin — circulated to members of the Panel), gives reasons for believing that we have the possibility of carrying through provisional settlements with the Russians when, as Secretary Acheson has said, we are negotiating from strength and where our proposed agreement registers an existing situation of fact. If we accept Mr. Acheson's criteria, what procedures are indicated?

13. We have strength now in atomic weapons first and foremost; our weakness is in equipment and forces-in-being although our potential is very great. During the next five years we shall build up our forces but the strategic value of our atomic superiority is bound to show a sharp decline. From our point of view, the sooner we recommence negotiations with the Russians on control of atomic energy, the better our position will be. On this particular subject, we are playing from strength now whereas in a few years we shall be playing from weakness. Further, of all the major subjects at issue, this is the only one on which we can play from strength.

14. In support of this proposition, there are two additional arguments:

(i) It is technically much simpler to control atomic energy effectively than it is to control almost any other category of weapon;

(ii) Public opinion in all countries (at least in those where it can show itself) is more concerned with the problem of atomic energy control than with any other issue dividing the Powers. The Soviet Union has taken full propaganda advantage of recent United States official statements which were interpreted by the Russians, to good effect, as virtually closing the door on further atomic negotiations.

15. Our timetable should therefore try to begin with negotiations for the control of atomic energy, and if these are in any way successful, should foresee an early extension of the negotiations to cover conventional armaments as well; for, as has been stressed in this memorandum, the two questions cannot in the long run be considered separately: if we were to get an agreement on the international control of atomic energy, we would be leaving the West defenceless, as Senator Tydings has wisely pointed out, if we did not either build up our own conventional forces or secure agreement on a means of scaling down Soviet forces until a balance had been achieved.

16. What we mean by a balance of forces has been well defined by General Bradley, in an article in the Saturday Evening Post last October 15, when he said that Western defence policy should aim at building up sufficient forces to convince the Russians that they could not defeat us, while at the same time convincing the Russians that we did not possess enough forces to contemplate an attack upon them. The same criteria would apply to a scaling down of forces of both sides, as to the building up of forces on our side, which was the subject of General Bradley's article.

17. While recognizing the desirability of dealing with disarmament of all weapons, including atomic, at one series of conferences, we must expect to encounter even more resistance on the part of the Russians to any sort of inspection which would enable us to satisfy ourselves that the provisions of a general disarmament agreement were being carried out, than would be the case with the type of inspection necessary for an effective atomic agreement. Moreover, from our point of view, we should, in dealing with conventional armaments, be negotiating from weakness. Still more important, a buildup on both sides of conventional weapons alone, if atomic energy were under control, would not create anything like the degree of international tension that would result from a world situation in which both sides lived daily in the fear of being annihilated by a sudden surprise onslaught with atomic and possibly hydrogen weapons. We should therefore try for a general disarmament conference but not turn down an opportunity to negotiate an atomic agreement alone.

18. If these are our objectives, the possible procedures for achieving them are numerous and by no means exclusive. On the immediate horizon, it seems likely, although we have had no reports to this effect, that Mr. Acheson, Mr. Bevin and Mr. Schuman will discuss not only the German question at their forthcoming meeting in April, but also our other major points at issue with the Russians including atomic energy. If the three Foreign Ministers find themselves of one mind on atomic energy, they might have a further discussion, possibly of a more general character, with their North Atlantic partners at the meeting of the Council towards the end of April or May: such a discussion could take place under Article 1 of the Treaty. On the other hand, they might well consider the Council too public a forum for discussion of so vital an issue.

19. Discussions between either the three or the twelve Foreign Ministers might well raise the possibility of Two, Three, or Four-Power negotiations at a high level on atomic energy and other questions. Although it goes beyond the scope of this paper, it might be appropriate for the Panel to consider, as far as atomic energy negotiations were concerned, whether the Canadian Government should be prepared to support direct U.S.-Soviet negotiations or would prefer negotiations to be confined to the U.N. so that we could continue to take a direct part in them.

20. The six permanent members of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission will be able to resume their discussions, in accordance with the Assembly's instructions, as soon as two more members of the Security Council have recognized the Communist Government of China. Perhaps, then, within a few weeks these negotiations may be resumed. However, the history of the atomic energy negotiations through the United Nations since 1946 has been so full of frustrations that it might be in many ways preferable to encourage direct preliminary U.S.-Soviet negotiations outside the U.N. where discussions would have a better chance of taking place without any publicity as to the detail of the negotiations and where a larger number of issues could be raised informally, and set one against another.

21. The Secretary of State for External Affairs touched on a number of these questions in a statement to the House of Commons; on March 3rd, copies of which have been circulated to members of the Panel. In the course of his remarks, he said that he agreed with Secretary General Trygve Lie's comment that we should welcome negotiations, "at all times and on all levels ... inside the United Nations and outside the United Nations."[53]

The Basis of Negotiations

22. In all their recent public statements, United States officials have maintained that the majority plan was for them the only acceptable basis for further negotiations. Soviet spokesmen, official and unofficial, have been equally insistent in saying that they could not possibly accept anything like the majority plan nor regard it as a basis for negotiations. It is true that various United States spokesmen have said that they did not regard the majority plan as the last word in perfection and that they would always be ready to consider a better plan, meaning a more effective plan, but they have made it clear that this should not be interpreted as committing them to any concessions from the majority plan but rather to tightening up possible loopholes in it. So far as we have been able to discover, no consideration is being given to possible concessions, although there is some talk of ways and means by which the general deadlock with the Russians could be at least eased. Our representatives in Washington have heard no hint of any modifications of the majority plan being considered privately by United States authorities with the exception of Mr. George Kennan's proposal last November for a type of "inspection only" plan which seems to have been stillborn.[54] Nevertheless, if the Panel is agreed as to the desirability and urgency of trying to negotiate a settlement with the Russians on the control of atomic energy, we should be asking ourselves not only how the negotiations might proceed, but on what basis.

23. The first question would seem to be whether or not we regard the majority plan in more or less its present form as the basis for a settlement that the Russians could possibly be brought to accept by negotiation and, possibly, by concessions in other directions, or as part of a general settlement of outstanding issues. On the present record, it is difficult to see why the Russians should accept a plan which they firmly believe could be used as a means of restricting the level of economic activity in the Soviet Union by curtailing the development of power from atomic energy. It is equally difficult to see why the Russians should accept, now that they have developed atomic weapons of their own, a plan which would place their territories under international inspection and would, for an indeterminate time, after an agreement were signed, leave the United States stockpile of bombs intact and controlled solely by the United States.

24. The majority plan has been developed by a cooperative effort of mind by the majority of the Atomic Energy Commission during the past four years. It has been subject to the most careful scrutiny by our best qualified experts, and it represents what we believe are the essential minimum requirements necessary to guarantee the world an acceptable degree of security from surprise atomic attack. Yet, if we can assume that the Russians will never accept it as it stands, we must reconsider its provisions in the light of our own urgent need for some sort of agreement that may not provide us with as much security but would provide us with considerably more than we shall have by 1954 without any agreement.

25. Now, we are here on a slippery and dangerous slope. A number of the smaller nations at the last Assembly were thinking along these lines and beyond. They would have liked to support a convention for prohibition of atomic bombs without inspection and control provisions. As the Soviet stockpile grows, and fears multiply, there will be increasing pressure at succeeding Assemblies unless we can convince our friends, as we managed to do last time, that a genuine effort was being made to reach agreement, with a readiness to make concessions of substance on our part, if concessions were at all likely to be forthcoming from the Soviet Union.

26. The question of concessions requires most careful thought, as to what concessions, if any, could be made in the majority plan in order to make it somewhat more acceptable to the Soviet Union without turning it into a sham proposal such as that which has been advanced since 1947 by Soviet representatives for propaganda purposes.

27. The concession which we could make most easily would be to delete from the majority plan the Baruch proposal on the veto. The original Acheson-Lilienthal Report did not suggest that the unanimity rule in Security Council proceedings should be inapplicable to discussions of punishment in the case of atomic energy violations. Mr. Baruch insisted that it should. We now recognize that the Security Council would only be involved in such a discussion if there were a state of war or an imminent risk of war between the major powers, and the question of the veto would therefore be highly theoretical, as a breakdown of negotiations or an attempt to enforce a majority decision, might in any case lead directly to a conflict. The majority plan could not possibly prevent atomic weapons being used in the course of a long war and the veto adds nothing to the objective of ensuring a degree of security from surprise atomic attack.

28. A proposal to delete the veto provision from the majority plan would have a good deal of value to us as a concession for propaganda purposes, but would probably not be taken too seriously by the Soviet Union which would recognize that we were not giving up anything very substantial.

29. From among the very numerous suggestions for compromise which have been advanced, both in and out of United Nations, it would appear that the concessions of substance mostly worthwhile considering center upon two basic provisions of the majority plan. The first concerns international ownership; the second the question of "stages".

30. As regards international ownership, most of the public and private discussion during the past few months has been upon the Romulo-Kennan theme that there might be a way of avoiding international management or ownership of any atomic facilities by concentrating instead on complete inspection as in itself an adequate means of control.

31. Apparently Mr. Kennan thought that we might agree to limiting the size of our atomic establishments to low-power piles useful only for research and small enough that they could safely be licenced by an International Atomic Authority to national management — subject, of course, to international inspection.

32. The almost insuperable objection to this proposal, especially from the Soviet point of view, is that you cannot carry on research for the development of power from atomic energy in a low-power reactor which, the majority plan already provides, might be nationally operated under licence.[55] Such a proposal would simply provide the Soviet Union with a golden propaganda opening as we would be held up to the nations of the world, and to the Asiatic countries in particular, as proposing to retard the atomic era for the benefit of existing power interests.

33. All that might be possibly conceded in the direction of modifying control through ownership provisions of the majority plan would be to:

(i) Enlarge somewhat the definition of plants that could be licenced to national management;

(ii) Restrict more precisely the functions of international management, and,

(iii) Define in more exact terms, as a basis for negotiation, the power quotas that we think could reasonably be allocated to the various regions of the world, so as to maintain the principle of "strategic location", neither the Soviet nor the Western sphere being given a preponderance of atomic facilities, but neither being put at any economic disadvantage because of the possible reluctance of one side to make the fullest use of atomic energy for power.

34. Perhaps the most important factor in leading us towards a modification of the present majority plan in respect to operation and management, is the knowledge that through technical developments, we are now able to detect not only atomic explosions anywhere in the world but also the major production facilities anywhere in the world, and to make a rough estimate of their location. The Panel will undoubtedly wish to discuss this aspect of the problem further in relation to the need for maintaining that the international inspectorate must have complete freedom of movement within the territories of any State. Would it be possible, for example, to confine our inspection and control proposals to declared plants in the knowledge that we could detect undeclared facilities, provided we should have the right of inspection by air or on the ground in any areas where we might suspect the existence of clandestine plants.[56]

[55] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
?? [L.B. Pearson]

35. The other broad section of the majority plan that might be profitably re-examined with a view to meeting Soviet objections is the question of "stages". We may assume that the Soviet Union will not sign an agreement which would place their territories under international inspection for several years during which the United States would have full control over its own atomic stockpile. We should be able to give the Russians, during our negotiations, a more precise idea of how long it would take to put our control plan into effect. We might also consider the desirability of proposing some sort of action that would, from the day of the signing of the Treaty, confer benefits upon the Soviet Union corresponding to those benefits which we would be deriving from rights of inspection within the Soviet Union during the interval of two or three years while the inspection and control system was being put into full effect. During the interval, for instance, it might be agreed that there should be a progressive destruction of atomic bombs, proportional to the total stockpiles on each side; but as this is probably demanding more mutual confidence than exists in present circumstances, it might be slightly less impractical to suggest that, with effect from the signing of the Treaty, all atomic bombs, mechanisms and nuclear fuels should be put under United Nations escrow, preferably in some continent remote from both the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A., such as Africa.[57]

36. If we are to consider what concessions we might be prepared to make, it is equally important that we should know what concessions we are not prepared to make. Two proposals that have been much discussed in the press might be brought forward under this heading.

37. The first is the suggestion that the United States should be prepared to tie her hands to a majority vote of the Security Council, declaring that it would never use the bomb except in case of aggression as defined by the Security Council. If the analysis of the military prospect earlier in this paper is sound, we would be taking a very grave risk in limiting ourselves in any way in the use of our major — indeed our only strong — strategic weapon upon which the balance of power depends so largely at the present time and upon which it will continue to depend at least until the end of 1952, after which, our estimates show, its value will probably decline quite rapidly.[58]

[56] Note marginale:/Marginal note: Contradictory? [L.B. Pearson]

[57] Note marginale:/Marginal note: ? [L.B. Pearson]

38. The second concession which has been much discussed, but which it would be most dangerous to make, in our opinion, is any major revision of the majority proposals on inspection. This point has been so often elaborated, particularly by Mr. Pearson during the last Session of the Assembly, that it is unnecessary to go into detail in this paper, if the Panel is agreed as to the conclusion.[59]

The Hydrogen Bomb as it Affects the Majority Plan

39. It is perhaps too early to discuss the possible effects of the development of a weapon which does not yet exist and which may never be made, upon the requirements of a system of international inspection and control. For our present purposes, it is probably sufficient to assume, on the basis of our technical knowledge of the possibilities, that the problem of international control will not be altered in any essential respect, except to make it more important than ever that there should be no loopholes. The installations required for the large-scale separation of tritium or deuterium could probably be more readily concealed — deuterium plants as hydro-electric installations, and tritium plants as chemical factories. There would, of course, be no problem of the disposal of radioactive wastes nor would there be any tell-tale mining operations on a large scale, such as must take place in support of a programme for the production of uranium or plutonium. The international control plan would have to be based primarily upon the control of fissionable materials, as fusionable materials could more readily be produced clandestinely. However, if the control system were effective in preventing the secret production of nuclear fuels, it would be impossible to explode any kind of hydrogen bomb, as there would be no material for a fission reaction to trigger it. On the other hand, as has been pointed out earlier in this paper, any leakages of nuclear fuels to secret stockpiles would be ten or one hundred times more important if a hydrogen bomb is successfully developed. The possibility of developing a hydrogen bomb, therefore, makes it all the more important that any concessions in the majority plan should be most cautiously screened. However, it also makes our need for agreement all the more urgent.

Conclusion

40. A number of propositions have been put forward in this paper for Panel discussion. Any one of them may be analysed in much greater detail if it is the wish of the Panel.

41. Underlying this paper is the belief that in spite of the extremely discouraging record to date, we may yet find that atomic energy control is the subject on which it will be possible to make the first breach in the deadlock — and at the same time the first breach in the Iron Curtain. If we can think through in advance, in as much detail as possible, the sort of procedures and proposals which we should be prepared to sponsor, we should be ready when the time comes — and it may come soon — to exploit that breach to the full and work through it until a genuine peace front has been opened up. Only by demonstrating our readiness to negotiate, and to lower our sights a little on our target of international security, may we retain the whole hearted support of the Western world and reach at least some degree of security for long enough to allow the political issue to be decided in the final analysis by the wishes of the people concerned and not by any kind of bombs. We cannot hope for more than that.

Procès-verbal d'une réunion de la Commission consultative sur l'énergie atomique, le 21 mars 1950

Minutes of Meeting of Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy, March 21,1950

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], March 22, 1950

Present:

Mr. N.A. Robertson — In the Chair (Secretary to the Cabinet),
Honourable L.B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs),
General the Honourable A.G.L. McNaughton (Canadian Permanent Delegate to the Atomic Energy Commission),
Dr. C.J. Mackenzie (President, National Research Council),
Dr. O.M. Solandt (Chairman, Defence Research Board),
Mr. Escott Reid (Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs).
James George — Acting Secretary

I. INTERNATIONAL CONTROL OF ATOMIC ENERGY

1. The Panel considered a working paper dated March 18 prepared in the Department of External Affairs reviewing the Canadian Government's position on the international control of atomic energy.

2. General McNaughton thought that the Panel should begin with an examination of the technical factors involved before considering far-reaching recommendations. He asked in the first place for the opinion of Dr. Mackenzie and Dr. Solandt on the hydrogen bomb, and how it might be expected to affect the problem of international control.

3. Dr. Mackenzie and Dr. Solandt had formed the general impression from talking to both U.S. and U.K. officials and scientists, that, while President Truman's decision that the United States would endeavour to make a hydrogen bomb had radically affected public opinion on the subject of international control and might have created a new "political era", a new technical era had not in fact begun, as the United States Atomic Energy Commission had been working for many months on the problem of a fusion bomb and there was no indication that there had been a radical change in their programme or budget, but only a greater emphasis on this aspect of their programme. There was, in fact, some indication that U.S. thinking on the problems of fusion had not advanced very far, and there were certainly very great difficulties to be overcome before a fusion reaction could be achieved. The scientists did not, in any case, foresee the sudden development of a hydrogen bomb with a release of energy enormously greater than that of a fission reaction: rather, they expected the development of a series of bombs, all with a core of fissionable material, using progressively larger quantities of fusionable material.

4. In these circumstances, Mr. Pearson said, it appeared unlikely that the United States could re-establish, by the development of hydrogen bombs, the same sort of lead in atomic weapons which had acted as a deterrent while the U.S. monopoly remained unbroken. Insofar as U.S. policy was based on the assumption of the continuing deterrent value of atomic superiority on the side of the United States, it might prove to be ill-founded.

5. General McNaughton said that all his conversations with U.S. scientific and military people had led him to the conclusion that the U.S. margin of superiority in atomic weapons was today greater than it had ever been, and that the Russians had a very long way to go, from their nuclear explosion, to the production of a stockpile of bombs.

6. Mr. Reid observed that the deterrent value of atomic superiority on our side was based on the Russian assessment of our stockpile and potential, as against theirs, and it was just as important as a deterrent for the Russians to believe that the United States had a great margin of superiority as it was to possess such a margin in fact. Dr. Mackenzie pointed out, however, that if Fuchs had told the Russians all he knew, they would have had a very good appraisal of the U.S. atomic position at the end of the war.

7. Mr. Pearson concluded that there was no technical information which would lead to any radical change in government policy on international control. Although the technical position may not have changed, he said, public opinion believed that it had, and was exerting pressure on governments to do something towards reaching international agreement as soon as possible. At the last Assembly, Mr. Vishinsky had made many ambiguous statements — about the veto and about inspection, for example — by means of which the Russians had been cultivating the impression that they were making concessions which we had turned down. We should be playing into their hands if we allowed the issue of atomic energy control to lie dormant. The only way to pin down the Russians and expose their position was to get them to resume negotiations. He wondered whether it would not be wise to suggest that, if the Six-Power Talks in the United Nations could not be resumed until the question of Chinese representation had been settled, the other five permanent members of the Atomic Energy Commission, including the Soviet representative, should meet informally, in much the same way as the representatives of the five Western countries had been meeting ad hoc throughout the Six-Power Talks.

8. General McNaughton said that before any decision was taken on this suggestion, we should consult with our partners in London and Washington. He added that he did not see how we could retain the support, at the Fifth Session of the General Assembly, of all the States that had gone along with us at the Fourth Session, unless the Atomic Energy Commission had met and brought up to date the majority plan. He thought it was essential to write into the plan the revisions which he had indicated at the last Assembly were generally accepted by the leaders of the majority, so that the plan would reflect the latest thinking on this subject and be completely up to date.

9. Mr. Pearson doubted that the Soviet Union would accept the majority plan, even if it were somewhat revised as General McNaughton had in mind. He suggested that we should take another serious look at (i) our conception of international ownership and (ii) at ways and means of gaining international agreement for a qualified prohibition on the use of atomic weapons. As regards ownership, he wondered whether we could not abandon the concept altogether if we were to get a satisfactory system of inspection.

10. General McNaughton agreed that the term "ownership" was undesirable and was broader in its meaning than what the majority now had in mind, which was perhaps better expressed by his term "hold in trust". However, he did not see how any system of inspection could be satisfactory if control of major installations were not vested in the international agency.

11. Mr. Reid wondered whether, if we believe that the Russians would not accept the majority plan and the United States could not safely give up her stockpile of bombs for anything less, some more limited bargain might not be reached in the interim in exchange for Soviet acceptance of a scheme that went no further than inspection. Would the U.S. be prepared, for example, Mr. Pearson added, to give up direct control of its stockpile of bombs in exchange for agreement on international inspection alone?

12. Mr. Reid said that he felt any proposal for some sort of self-denying ordinance would be very difficult for the United States to oppose and that it was, therefore, desirable to have more to show to the next General Assembly than simply a majority plan brought up to date. If we did not propose something that we would be prepared to accept, others might seriously embarrass us by asking us to go much further than we could.

13. After further discussion, the Panel agreed that:

(a) Mr. Pearson would ask Mr. Wrong and Mr. Wilgress to sound out the U.S. and U.K. authorities as to the desirability of suggesting that, until the Six-Power Talks could be resumed with Chinese representation acceptable to all, the Five-Powers should meet informally to discuss atomic energy control: if the Soviet Union were to turn down such an invitation, we should at least have shown our good faith in wanting to resume negotiations; if the Russians were to accept, we should have an opportunity of exposing their so-called "concessions".

(b) We should also suggest to the U.S. and U.K. authorities the desirability of planning to hold meetings of all members of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission, commencing early in the summer, so that we should have had an opportunity of bringing the majority plan up to date before the next General Assembly.

TELEGRAM EX-517[60] Ottawa, March 27, 1950

TOP SECRET

At a meeting of the Atomic Energy Panel on March 21, attended by Robertson, McNaughton, Mackenzie, Solandt, Reid and myself, we concluded that an effort might usefully be made to resume informal atomic discussions with the Russians as soon as possible. As I said in my March 3 statement in the House, I have been concerned for some time by the impression which the Russians have been cultivating, and which seems to be gaining ground in public opinion in Western countries too, that Vishinsky, in his double talk at the last Assembly, offered concessions, or implied concessions, to which the Western countries have not responded. It is difficult to kill this sort of propaganda unless we succeed in pinning down the Soviet representatives to a detailed explanation of their position which will expose it for the sham it is. It seems to me that the only practicable way of trying to do this is by resuming negotiations with the Russians.

2. The Six-Power Talks cannot, of course, be resumed until the Security Council has admitted the representative of the Communist Government of China. As it now appears that there may be more delay than we had expected before this occurs, we might consider having informal Five-Power meetings of the U.K., U.S., France, U.S.S.R. and Canada. The representatives on the Atomic Energy Commission of the U.K., U.S., France, China and Canada have frequently held informal meetings and we see no reason why similar purely informal meetings should not be held among as many of the Powers chiefly concerned as possible. The essential is to get the Soviet representatives to come and be able to pin them down, in accordance with the Assembly's instructions to the Atomic Energy Commission and its six permanent members.

3. We realize, of course, that the Russians would probably refuse any such invitation with the rejoinder that in a discussion of so important a subject it would be unjustifiable to exclude the representatives of the world's most populous nation. Their reply might also contain the implication that in negotiations on the control of atomic energy the Soviet Union should have the right to be supported by the only one of the six powers which might now be sympathetic with its general point of view. Both these points might offset, certainly in the Asian countries and to some extent in the West also, the propaganda advantages which we might expect to gain either if negotiations were resumed or by demonstrating publicly that it is the Russians and not we who are dragging our feet on this issue. On balance, however, we think we have more to gain than to lose.

4. We also recognize that in present circumstances the United Kingdom Government might feel some hesitation in laying itself open to the charge of being a party to the exclusion of the Chinese and that neither they nor the U.S. Government would wish to take the initiative in calling meetings of this character. The French representative is Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission this month and for this reason his Government might also wish to avoid taking the initiative in short-cutting the Atomic Energy Commission and its six permanent members. However, if we had assurances beforehand that the Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom would be prepared to send representatives to informal meetings of the Six without China, I think the Canadian Government would be prepared to take the initiative in issuing the invitations. We should, of course, be careful to emphasize that the exclusion of Chinese representation could not be taken as a precedent in dealing with this problem in formal United Nations bodies, such as the Security Council; the Six-Power Talks themselves have been recognized to be quite informal discussions for which U.N. secretarial assistance is furnished as a courtesy; we see nothing to prevent any combination of countries from meeting together ad hoc in order to discuss any particularly urgent international question such as atomic energy.

5. For your own information, I am a bit worried by the unyielding position adopted by the U.S. Administration on the subject of negotiations with the Russians in general. I should have thought that a little show of enthusiasm for resuming negotiations on atomic energy would help Acheson in meeting public criticism that could, if it is not somehow mollified, lead to a retreat on a much broader front.

6. Would you please take the next convenient opportunity of discussing this idea with the State Department informally at a suitably high level. I am also asking Canada House to sound out the U.K. Government.

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Reference your telegram No. 447 of March 29th regarding suggested informal atomic energy discussions.

1. I called today on Sir Roger Makins who had just returned from Paris. He said that the same idea had occurred to their officials as had been discussed in our atomic energy panel on March 21st. At the beginning of March they had had a thorough exploration of the suggestion on the official level but had come to the conclusion that there were more disadvantages than advantages from the propaganda viewpoint in the further pursuit of the idea. In particular, they felt all Chinese, whether Communist or Nationalist, would resent the exclusion of Chinese participation and that the Russians could obtain more propaganda value from upholding Chinese rights than we would gain from having proposed immediate informal discussions without waiting for a settlement of the United Nations deadlock over China.

2. At this stage I interrupted to point out to Makins the paragraph about atomic discussions in the published protest of Tsiang against suggestion of Lie, which Wrong referred to in paragraph 1 of teletype WA-757 of March 30th.† This appeared to be new to Makins and he took a careful note of what I said.

3. Makins then said that their conclusion a month ago had been that the only course was to seek a solution of the United Nations deadlock over Chinese participation and to accept deferment of further discussions on atomic energy until the deadlock had been resolved. In the meantime they had been taking care to allay their own public opinion by statements in the House of Commons pointing out the true facts of the situation and reaffirming United Kingdom readiness to resume discussions with the Russians at any time. One such statement had been made in the House of Commons last night. I shall telegraph you the text when it is available after the holidays.

4. In conclusion Makins said that while this had been and still is their attitude on the official level, he would raise the question with Bevin after the Easter holidays and inform him of what had been transpiring on the official level in Ottawa, London and Washington. He would advise me as soon as he had had the opportunity of consulting with the Secretary of State.

Note from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs[61]

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], April 13, 1950

You will have seen from the notes on my conversations with Jessup and Rusk that we discussed at some length the problem of the international control of atomic energy.[62] Two questions emerged from our discussions, one concerning the method by which negotiations on atomic energy might be renewed and the other concerning the attitude to be adopted if it were possible to resume negotiations.

In regard to the first of these questions, we came to the conclusion that it was most unlikely that the Russians could be persuaded to resume negotiations on atomic energy in any of the existing bodies established for the consideration of that subject, unless the Chinese Communist Government were included in the discussions. On the other hand, it was thought that the Russians were probably quite prepared to talk about atomic energy if some method could be found for resuming discussions which did not force them to withdraw from the position they had taken that 450 million Chinese must be represented, and could only be represented by the government at Peiping. The suggestion then emerged that we might consider taking up again amongst the three original signatories of the first atomic energy declaration, the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada, the question of international control, and then enlarging this group to include first the Russians and then the French. I agreed that we would give some consideration to this suggestion in Ottawa, and it has occurred to me that we might even take the initiative in calling these meetings. If we were to do so, I think the subject is one which I might discuss privately with Mr. Bevin and Mr. Acheson in London.

In regard to the substance of the discussion, Rusk of the State Department volunteered the opinion that, in the absence of any real hope of agreement with the Russians on the basis of the majority plan, there might be some merit in considering an international agreement prohibiting the use of the atomic bomb. He said that such a treaty would, of course, be effective only because of the threat of retaliatory action, and would not in itself lead to disarmament in atomic weapons. It was realized also that the merit of this approach would depend on a delicate calculation of the relative importance of the deterrent effect of the bomb upon the Russians as compared with the damage which the Russians might do even with a relatively small stock pile of atomic weapons. We did not pursue this aspect of our discussion in any detail in New York, but I think that Rusk's observation is one to which further consideration should be given.

I should be grateful if the two suggestions which I have outlined, one concerning renewed discussions on atomic energy and the other concerning the substance of these discussions, could be considered in the Department so that we can form some judgment on them prior to the meetings in London. It is perhaps not necessary at this stage to put them formally before the atomic energy panel and I think for the present that our consideration might be confined to members of the Department, with the possible addition of Mr. Robertson.

TOP SECRET Washington, April 21, 1950

Dear Mr. Robertson:

The suggestions agreed at the Advisory Panel meeting held on March 21st that the U.S. and U.K. authorities should be sounded out on the possibility of resuming six-power talks on atomic energy or holding meetings of all members of the U.N. Atomic Energy Commission this summer, which was also the subject of your letter covering the minutes, of March 28th,† have now been fully explored with the State Department, in talks which Mr. Pearson had in New York, in my recent conversation with Hickerson, as well as between Ignatieff and Arneson. I take it that you will have seen the record of the conversation which Mr. Pearson had in New York with Messrs. Jessup, Rusk and Gross. My talk with Hickerson was reported in a letter to Mr. Pearson dated April 15th, and a copy of this letter was sent to Mr. Heeney.[63]

Ignatieff had a talk with Arneson on two separate occasions. In substance, Arneson was not able to add anything to what Hickerson had told me, as reported in the second and third paragraphs of my letter to Mr. Pearson of April 15th.

However, in a conversation on Friday, April 21st, Arneson was able to give Ignatieff an indication of the position which Mr. Acheson is expected to take should the question of atomic energy discussions be raised in the meeting of the North Atlantic Council next month. Arneson indicated that Mr. Acheson would probably take the line that, in the opinion of the U.S. Government, the proper forum for any atomic energy discussions with the Russians is in the six-power group. This is in accordance with the resolution adopted by the General Assembly at the last session which requested "the permanent members of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission to continue their consultations, to explore all possible avenues and examine all concrete suggestions with a view to determining whether they might lead to an agreement securing the basic objectives of the General Assembly in this question, and to keep the Atomic Energy Commission and the General Assembly informed of their progress". Mr. Acheson is also expected to say that, insofar as the U.S. Government is concerned, they are prepared to resume talks in this forum at any time. He would recall that the reason why these talks were suspended was owing to the withdrawal of the Russians on the technical pretext of the Chinese representation and that this attitude of the Soviet Union well illustrates their attitude to this as well as other important aspects of the work in the United Nations.

[63] Voir le document 230./See Document 230.

Arneson said that the U.S. Government do not agree with the desirability of planning to hold meetings of the U.N. Atomic Energy Commission as a whole, as such discussions would not accord with the intent expressed in the General Assembly resolution referred to above and, moreover, would serve no useful purpose. The U.S. authorities, however, would not exclude the possibility of the sponsoring powers meeting before the next General Assembly convenes for further consultations. In this connection, Arneson recalled that, at the time when the Russians walked out of the six-power talks in New York, Hickerson was in favour of continuing the meeting of the group, if only to show that the Russians should not be allowed to frustrate the continuing work of the United Nations in this important field. It was the opposition of the French member, Chauvel, to this idea that prevented a meeting taking place without the Russians, which would have established a useful precedent. Arneson indicated, moreover, that the U.S. is not likely to take the initiative in calling for a meeting of the sponsoring powers group itself. The reason for this, as I reported in my letter to Mr. Pearson of April 15th, is that the general impression in the State Department is that the real difficulty in the atomic talks with the Russians is not any particular element in the majority plan but the continuing attitude of the Soviet Government on the question of international collaboration generally, and that unless this attitude changes, to seek agreement on any particular aspect in the international control plan would lead nowhere and might only increase the sense of public frustration.

I note from copies of telegrams from Wilgress which you have transmitted to us here that the suggestion for informal atomic energy discussion has been taken up with the British through London. I take it, therefore, that there would appear to be no point in discussing this question through officials of the British Embassy here, as suggested in your letter.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

Repeat Permdel No. 490.
Your message WA-2004 of September 1st† re international control of atomic energy.

1. You may tell the State Department that the report they had heard from The Hague of the Canadian Delegation submitting new proposals on the international control of atomic energy at the forthcoming session of the Assembly is not, repeat not, correct.

2. As you know, we had, last winter, been thinking about what modifications might be made in the present U.N. majority plan without affecting the essential provisions for international inspection anywhere, at any time, as indicated in the Minister's statement to the General Assembly Ad Hoc Committee last November 7th. However, the present international climate is hardly likely to produce, at the forthcoming session of the Assembly, anything more than a propaganda debate, for which we are currently preparing. We should be glad to have any indication you may be able to give us of State Department thinking in this regard.

3. As you will have seen from the copies of the telegrams referred to you, we have asked Riddell for his appreciation on the assumption that we should be prepared, even if there have been no further meetings of the Six-Powers, for India or one of the smaller countries to raise the subject of atomic energy control. The subject clearly has to be faced, even though the prospects of a settlement are more remote than ever, because of the understandable anxiety of all peoples for some sort of security in a world in which shooting has already begun. We think, therefore, that the western countries should be prepared to meet the charge that we are "standing pat" on the majority plan. However, we no longer contemplate any major modifications of the plan which would have to await a willingness on both sides to make a general settlement. Riddell has replied saying that a propaganda debate is regarded as inevitable, although neither the U.K. or U.S. Delegations regard the prospect with any enthusiasm. He adds that these Delegations do not appear to have given much thought to the question of tactics.

ATOMIC ENERGY

It is expected that the question of atomic energy will be raised in plenary at the beginning of next week. Yesterday Holmes attended a meeting with Coulson of the United Kingdom, Nash of the United States, Shann of the Australian delegations to discuss tactics. Attached is the text of a draft resolution,† based on an original Australian suggestion, presented at the meeting by Nash and somewhat revised by those present.

2. The Americans and Australians had agreed in advance that, although the present circumstances were not propitious for any advance on either phase of disarmament, nevertheless it was desirable to present in advance to the Assembly a proposal based on President Truman's statement of October 24th which would head off dangerous recommendations that might be expected from various quarters.[64] They emphasized that such a proposal should, while indicating an open mind, not jeopardize the majority plan.[65] It should not be specious or entirely meaningless, and it should not create false hopes of accomplishment. They recognized, of course, that the offer to link the question of atomic energy and conventional armaments laid them open to a Soviet charge of inconsistency.

3. The United Kingdom have been inclined to think that it would be better to recognize that nothing could be done at this time and that no new machinery should be created. However, Coulson said that personally he accepted the argument that it would be better to make an offer of some kind to direct the Assembly away from demands that would be unacceptable. He thought his Government would probably go along with the Australian-United States proposal.

4. Holmes, who attended the meeting without advance notice, said that he had no recent indications of his Department's views, but he thought that they would agree with the principle of examining the desirability of merging the A.E.C. and the C.C.A. He personally thought that many members of the Assembly would express great concern on the question of atomic energy, particularly in view of the controversy aroused by President Truman's most recent statement, and that it would be wise, therefore, for sponsors of the majority plan to meet the Assembly with a proposal of some kind. He suggested that one criticism of the proposed resolution might be that it put the whole question of disarmament in cold storage for a year. The others present agreed that this was a danger, although they emphasized that they had no intention of preventing the A.E.C. and C.C.A. or at least the five Powers, whose meetings to consider an end to the atomic impasse were suspended last January, from continuing their work during the year. Coulson advocated a stipulation to this effect in the last paragraph, but Nash and Shann thought the point might better be made in the statements by the sponsors.

5. It is proposed that the members of the Committee mentioned in the last paragraph should be the members of next year's A.E.C. and C.C.A. plus Australia; i.e. the Security Council with Canada and Australia added. Coulson and Holmes said that if Australia were to be added it might be desirable for Australia to sponsor the resolution by itself so that there might be some clear-cut reason for adding this one country to what was otherwise an obvious membership. Nash said that the United States was anxious to be a sponsor, in view of the President's having originally made the proposal on which it was based. Consideration was given to the possibil-

The General Assembly

Recognizing that the effective regulation and reduction of national armaments would substantially diminish the present danger of war, relieve the heavy economic burden placed upon the peoples of the world in the absence of a system of armaments control, and permit the greater use of man's resources to projects devoted to his betterment;

Recognizing that the regulation and reduction of armaments to be effective must include weapons of all kinds, must be based on unanimous agreement, and so must include every nation having substantial armaments and armed forces;

Recognizing further that any plan for the regulation and reduction or armaments and armed forces must be based upon safeguards that will assure the compliance of all nations;

Recognizing the inability to date to achieve agreement among nations on the elimination of atomic weapons under a system of effective international control of atomic energy and the regulation and reduction of other armaments and armed forces;

Recalling that a plan has been developed in the UNAEC and approved by the General Assembly for the international control of atomic energy, which would make effective the prohibition of atomic weapons; and that much useful planning work has been accomplished in the Commission for Conventional Armaments;

Desiring to carry this planning work forward toward a comprehensive system of armaments control;

Decides to establish a Committee of _____ to consider and report to the next regular session of the General Assembly on ways and means whereby the work of the AEC and the Commission for Conventional Armaments may be coordinated and upon the advisability of their functions being merged and placed under a new and consolidated Disarmament Commission. Your teletypes No. 601 and 602 of December 8 re draft resolution on atomic energy and conventional armaments.

1. Our first reaction to the draft resolution is unenthusiastic. It is, of course, only a preliminary draft, but we think an attempt should be made to tighten up the wording and generally to give the resolution more muscle than it now has. We think the operative part is weak and the preamble rather dull.

2. These uncharitable remarks, for your background information, impose the obligation of suggesting something better. In our immediately following message† we have attempted to re-draft the resolution not only changing the wording but the substance. Although we think this is some improvement, we would not suggest that you put it forward until you have polished it further and until we have your comments on the changes in substance which we have suggested.

3. Our main objective of substance is to see whether we could not take more positive action towards coordinating the functions of the AEC and CCA than setting up a Committee the principal reason for which, from the point of view of one of its sponsors, would appear to be to get on the Committee.

4. Although we cannot very well mention the point, you will have noted the connection between this proposal and Mr. Robertson's suggestion at the last meeting of the Atomic Energy Panel of which we told you in our Despatch No. 166 of November 21.†

5. As regards procedure and tactics, we concur in the very sensible comments made by Holmes at his meeting with the U.K., U.S. and Australian delegations. In particular, we share Holmes' doubts about adding Australia to the membership, as we feel that it would almost certainly lead to requests from other non-member countries which it might in some cases be difficult to refuse. This is perhaps a point that might be put in confidence to the United States and United Kingdom Delegations. If Australia were to be added, simply on the grounds of sponsoring the resolution, we might have to come to including all countries who had previously served on the Security Council.

6. As regards the question of sponsorship, we see no objection to your joining with other members of the Atomic Energy Commission in sponsoring whatever resolution on this subject might emerge on the general lines now under discussion. We are inclined to think, however, that the question of sponsorship is of less consequence than the way in which a resolution is supported.

7. We suppose that one of our principal objects in putting forward this resolution is to forestall an ill-considered resolution being put forward at the last moment. At the same time there is probably something to be said for making an effort to see whether the U.S.S.R. would be willing to co-operate seriously in merging consideration of atomic and conventional disarmament, on which they have done so much talking. If this is our object, we should take care to word the resolution so that it does not give the Russians any easy excuse for opposing it.

8. We assume that, as the Minister has already indicated publicly, Canada should be a member of any joint body to consider disarmament of conventional and atomic weapons.

PERSONAL & CONFIDENTIAL New York, December 14, 1950

Dear Bert [MacKay],

I am sorry that there has been no official response to your telegram No. 632 of December 9th, in which you commented on the draft resolution on atomic energy and conventional armaments. It was a very helpful telegram and I hope that you did not conclude that we had ignored it. What happened, however, was that the telegram reached here late on Saturday. It was impossible to find anyone to discuss it with until we reached Lake Success on Monday morning. The Minister arrived Monday morning and I explained the situation to him as we drove out in the car. He expressed very strong views about Australia's initiative and the reason for Australia endeavouring to get on this Committee. He said that he thought we ought to have nothing to do with the resolution; that we might vote in favour of it and possibly act as co-sponsor, but only if all the other members of the AEC — excepting of course the Soviet Union — were going to sponsor as well. As he did not want us to be involved, he thought, therefore, that we could not logically propose a substantial amendment.

It seemed to me the best thing, therefore, was to explain your suggestions to the British whose views on the whole resolution were very similar to ours. The British agreed with these suggestions, but by this time it was too late to do much with them. The Australians had already secured the agreement of a number of states to act as co-sponsors and were ready to table their draft. The subject was due for discussion in the Assembly on Tuesday and the resolution had to be submitted the day before. Consequently, we concentrated our attentions on politely discouraging the Australians. This was a matter which required a very delicate approach as the Australians would be quick to resist any endeavour on our part to exclude them from this distinguished body. However, the Australians in New York were well aware of their embarrassing position and not at all enthusiastic about a proposal which had been forced upon them by Spender. Late Monday afternoon, therefore, Sir Keith Officer took it upon himself to decide that Australia would not put her name forward for this body. He said it was time they stopped embarrassing their friends. When I reported this fact to the Minister, he agreed that we might now act as a co-sponsor. There was no time, however, to introduce amendments as these would have had to be discussed with all the other co-sponsors and would almost certainly have had to be referred back to the State Department and to the Foreign Office. The only thing I was able to do was to convince the Australians that their draft paragraph 2 was appallingly worded. They made a slight change which did not help very much.[66]

I am sorry that this all happened too quickly. If we hadn't had our minds concentrated on Korea, we might have done more advance preparation. I confess that I had been entirely unaware of the fact that this subject was to come up in Plenary until one morning last week when I was dragged off to a meeting, which I reported on, on a few minutes notice. I hope that you and Jim [George] do not consider that what has been done is too bad. Certainly, the formula you proposed would have been more satisfactory.

Yours sincerely,
JOHN [HOLMES]

HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR REFUGEES

I attach for your signature, if you approve, a despatch to the Chairman of the Canadian Delegation to the Assembly concerning the item dealing with the functions of the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees.

A commentary article† dealing with all the sub-headings of the item on refugees has already been approved and will be sent to New York within a day or two. The attached despatch deals solely with the question of the definition of refugee. It seems likely that this is the only part of the draft statute prepared by ECOSOC which may lead to controversy. You will remember that the Canadian Delegation at the Assembly last fall joined with the United States Delegation in supporting a category type definition, but that after further consideration, Cabinet approval was obtained to change our policy and to support a broad definition at the Eleventh Session of ECOSOC.[67] We did give strong support to the United Kingdom Delegation at the Council in their efforts to secure a general definition and this definition was rejected by a very narrow vote. The United Kingdom intends to reopen the issue at the Assembly and it is possible that the Council's decision may be reversed.

Some of the arguments which led us to favour a broad definition are less strong than they were, but on the whole, I think that both on moral and practical grounds we ought still to favour a general definition.

The attached despatch with its enclosure (Report of the Canadian Delegation to ECOSOC) indicates the developments which have taken place in the last few months. It may be useful for the Delegation to have this information before taking a stand on this matter at the Social Committee.

DESPATCH V-36 Ottawa, October 5, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL

ITEM 32 — HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR REFUGEES

I attach a copy of the report of the Canadian Delegation to the Eleventh Session of the Economic and Social Council† on the item dealing with the Statute of the High Commissioner for Refugees.

2. As you will note from the Delegation's report, they considered the final draft of the Statute to be quite satisfactory except for the definition of refugee. Therefore, while voting in favour of the Statute as a whole, they specifically reserved the position of the Canadian Delegation to the General Assembly in respect of the clause dealing with the competence of the High Commissioner.

3. The Canadian Delegation strongly supported the United Kingdom Delegation in urging a broad definition for "refugees" but the United States and French Delegations succeeded by a narrow majority in securing the category type of definition as at present incorporated in the draft convention on refugees. While the Canadian preference for a broad definition instead of a list of categories still stands, it should be noted that some of the reasons which influenced our thinking before the Council Session are no longer valid. In the first place, our fear of offending the Asian countries by restricting the competence of the High Commissioner to European refugees was apparently unfounded. At the Council, China voted in favour of the narrow definition, Pakistan abstained on all votes throughout the debate, and India, while abstaining on the Statute as a whole, supported the restrictive definition.

4. Until the summer session of ECOSOC, the United Kingdom, France, and Belgium had formed a solid front in support of a general definition of refugees both for the Convention and for purposes of the High Commissioner's Office. Canadian thinking was to some extent influenced by the fact that these European countries who were much more directly concerned with refugee problems than Canada, were strongly in favour of a wide definition to include all bona fide refugees. The defection of France has divided the Western European countries on the issue and seriously reduced the chances of obtaining a broad definition, even though, as explained in the attached report, it seems fairly clear that the conversion of France is one of convenience rather than conviction.

5. The unexpected stand taken by the Asian and French Governments removes one factor which accounted in part for Canadian support of the broad definition. Moreover the definition as worked out by the Council contains two improvements over the earlier draft as prepared by the ad hoc Committee.

6. By adding the words "or circumstances directly resulting from such events", (i.e. — events in Europe before January 1, 1951) to the description of category three, the definition is extended to cover refugees who may flee from Eastern Europe well after January 1, 1951, provided their flight is due to political trouble which is traceable to events occurring before January 1, 1951. The Council discussed this point in some detail and it was clearly the intention that a broad interpretation would be given to this phrase.

7. Secondly, the provision whereby the High Commissioner for Refugees is authorized to negotiate on behalf of other categories of refugees, pending a General Assembly decision on their eligibility, gives at least the possibility of liberalizing the competence of the High Commissioner.

8. The considerations outlined above will have some effect on the line of argument to be adopted on the discussion on refugees but do not seem to the Department to be sufficiently important to justify a reversal of our policy in support of a global definition.

9. There are two strong arguments against the present draft definition. The first is that the General Assembly has accepted the principle that the refugee problem is international in scope; it has established a High Commissioner's Office to look after refugees; it has clothed the High Commissioner with responsibilities of a legal and moral nature. It is hardly justifiable, therefore, to restrict his moral authority to refugees in a particular geographical area whose refugee status results from events occurring within particular time limits. On moral grounds, all bona fide refugees everywhere, present and future, should surely come within the mandate of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and that principle should be accepted and established now and not gradually reached on a piece-meal basis by adding a category at a time. The second objection to the present text of the competence clause is that General Assembly approval of each category will inevitably involve heated and prolonged political debates. It may well happen that a category of refugees, deserving on humanitarian grounds of whatever benefits the High Commissioner may be able to gain for them, will remain outside his mandate either because of obstructive tactics on the part of certain members of the United Nations or because well-disposed governments, reluctant to precipitate bitter propaganda debates, will be hesitant to sponsor new categories. A decision now to place all refugees under the competence of the High Commissioner would avoid such difficulties for the future.

10. If the category type definition is upheld it is, of course, better to have some provision for adding to the categories than to freeze the High Commissioner's mandate in its present form, but this method seems to us to be a second best alternative acceptable only if a general definition is rejected.

Third Committee completed yesterday general debate on item 6 of its agenda. As indicated in my despatch under reference, it was not considered necessary for the Canadian representative to make any statement at this stage.

2. Following rejection of a draft resolution by Byelorussia which would have condemned "United States, United Kingdom, France and other countries" for having failed to implement General Assembly Resolution 8/1 of February 12th, 1946,[68] the Social Committee agreed to give consideration first to definition of the term "refugee". A motion by Rochefort, the French delegate, that discussion on this term "refugee" should be proceeded with with regard to statute as well as to convention was accepted by the Committee.

3. Judging by number of draft resolutions and amendments already submitted, it is likely that this question will give rise to a very lengthy debate.

4. The delegation has agreed to co-sponsor with United Kingdom, Belgium and Turkey a draft resolution which would insert in draft statute and in draft convention a broad definition. Text of this joint draft resolution will be found in my immediately following teletype.

5. French delegate has been particularly vigorous, if not a little bitter, in his plea for the acceptance of a narrow definition both for the draft statute and for the draft convention. Yesterday's debate was clearly uncompromising in tone, and efforts are now being made, outside the Committee, to find a formula which would be acceptable to both the delegates supporting the French attitude and to those favouring the United Kingdom. We have been informed confidentially that the French delegation might be prepared to accept a broad definition along the lines suggested by us for the draft statute, provided the supporters of a broad definition were willing to accept a more restricted definition for the draft convention. It appears that apart from Rochefort's personal motives, the French delegation has genuine fears that a broad definition in the convention would make it possible for masses of refugees to seek asylum in France in case for instance of revolution in a neighbouring country.

In view of Rochefort's attitude, we are considering revising our joint resolution into two separate documents, dealing respectively with draft statute and draft convention. This procedure might facilitate acceptance of our definition for the draft statute, and any proposed definition for draft convention likely to get support of majority would be examined in light of our instructions.

7. The Committee is not meeting until tomorrow. A brief statement has been prepared in support of our joint draft resolution, stating various arguments which have prompted the Canadian delegation to support a broad definition, as outlined in the commentary.

The text of the resolution which you have agreed to co-sponsor with Belgium, Turkey and the United Kingdom appears to be satisfactory. It might be advisable however to have separate resolutions for the Statute and the convention for the reason which you have given and because these two instruments should be kept distinct and separate and stand on their own feet.

2. If you think, on the basis of the statements made to date, that the Social Committee is unlikely to approve a broad definition of refugees for the convention, you might try to get the French, the United States and other delegations in favour of the category-type definition to agree to some compromise. If this can be done you could then withdraw or modify your joint resolution in the interests of cooperation and unanimity. In the end if the United States definition finally comes to a vote without change and your joint resolution in either its present form or in a modified form has been defeated, you might in your discretion support it.

3. As regards the definition for the Statute, I think that you should continue to hold out as long as possible for the broad type of definition for the reasons given in the Commentary. It is more important that the Statute which sets forth United Nations objectives and the terms of reference of a United Nations official should be broad than the convention which, after all, will only concern those countries which adhere to it. However, if your joint resolution is defeated you might in your discretion support any other resolution, on the theory that half a loaf is better than none.

1. In the light of uncompromising tone of debate, the Social Committee agreed yesterday morning to set up an informal Working Party composed of representatives of delegations which had deposited resolutions or amendments. This Working Party, consisting of Belgium, Canada, France, Israel, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States, and Venezuela, met yesterday and today with a view to drafting compromise definitions. You will find in my immediately following teletype the text of the two definitions which this Working Party was able to present to the Social Committee late this afternoon.

2. We are satisfied that these texts are the best formula obtainable under the present circumstances. You will note that the definition for the Convention was arrived at by amending the definition suggested by ECOSOC. The definition devised for the Statute was arrived at by using our joint resolution as a working basis. On the theory that half a loaf is better than none and in the interest of cooperation and uniformity, we are inclined to support these two definitions.

3. These definitions will be discussed in Committee tomorrow and we are considering some minor amendments which would improve those provisions which we are somewhat more reluctant to accept:

(a) Part C. (3) of definition for Convention — to amend last part of sentence to read "and, because of such kinship, enjoys within the country/within the country the rights and privileges usually attached to the possession of the nationality of such country".

(b) In new paragraph suggested for general principles of Statute — also add the words "within the country/within the country" before the word "rights" in first sentence.

(c) Sub-paragraph (3) of paragraph (b) of definition regarding competence of High Commissioner — to amend sentence so as to read "such person does not at present/at present fall under the auspices of other organs or agencies of the United Nations or";.

4. We would appreciate having your early comments on the general suitability of these definitions. It may be, of course, that they may be further amended following consideration by members of Committee. We are inclined to believe, however, that they will be in substance acceptable to the majority.

1. Following are texts of definitions drafted by informal working party for Convention on the status of refugees and for Statute of High Commissioner's Office. Text begins:

I. Substitute the following text for Chapter 1, Article I of the draft Convention on the status of refugees, (Document E/1850):

"A. For the purposes of this Convention, the term "refugee" shall apply to any person who:

(1) Since 1st August 1914, has been considered a refugee under the arrangements of 12th May 1926 and 30th June 1928 or under the Conventions of 28th October 1933 and 10th February 1938, the Protocol of 14th September 1939 or the Constitution of the International Refugee Organization;

Decisions as to eligibility taken by the International Refugee Organization during the period of its activities shall not prevent the status of refugee being accorded to persons who fulfil the conditions of paragraph 2 of this Article;

(2) As a result of events occurring before 1st January 1951 and owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable, or owing to such fear or for reasons other than personal convenience is unwilling, to avail himself of the protection of that country; or who, not having a nationality and being outside the country of his former habitual residence, is unable, or owing to such fear or for reasons other than personal convenience, is unwilling to return to it;

In the case of a person who has more than one nationality, the above term 'the country of his nationality' shall mean all the countries of which he is a national, and a person shall not be deemed to be lacking the protection of the country of his nationality if, without any valid reason based on well-founded fear, he has not availed himself of the protection of one of the countries of which he is a national;

B. This Convention shall cease to apply to any person falling under the terms of Section A if:

(1) He has voluntarily reavailed himself of the protection of the country of his nationality;

(2) Having lost his nationality, he has voluntarily reacquired it;

(3) He has acquired a new nationality, and enjoys the protection of the country of his nationality;

(4) He has voluntarily re-established himself in the country which he left or outside which he remained owing to fear of persecution;

(5) He can no longer, because the circumstances in connexion with which he has been recognized as a refugee have ceased to exist, claim grounds other than those of personal convenience for continuing to refuse to avail himself of the protection of the country of his nationality.

C. (1) No contracting State shall apply the benefits of this convention to any person when there are serious reasons for considering that such person has committed a crime specified in Article VI of the London Charter of the International Military Tribunal;

(2) No contracting State shall be obliged, under the provisions of this Convention, to grant refugee status to any person falling under the provisions of Article 14, paragraph 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

(3) This Convention shall not apply to a person who has entered a country with whose nationals he has close ties of ethnic and cultural kinship and, because of such kinship, enjoys the rights and privileges usually attached to the possession of the nationality of such country.

D. The contracting States may agree to add to the definition of the term 'refugee' contained in this article persons in other categories, including such as may be recommended by the General Assembly.

II. Amend the Statute of the High Commissioner's Office for refugees, Chapter I, General Principles (A/1385, page 7) by inserting a new paragraph to be (I), the present four paragraphs to be renumbered II, III, and IV:

"The High Commissioner acting under the authority of the General Assembly, shall perform the function of providing international protection under the auspices of the United Nations, to refugees who do not enjoy the rights and privileges attaching to possession of a nationality in accordance with the conditions laid down in the Statute. In that connexion, he shall have the general power to intervene on behalf of all refugees who comply with the conditions laid down in this Statute. In the exercise of his functions and in particular should any difficulty arise, the High Commissioner shall request the opinion of the Advisory Council."

III. Amend Chapter III, Section C — competence, as follows:

"The persons to whom the competence of the High Commissioner extends shall include:

(a) Persons defined in Article I (Chapter I) of the Convention relating to the status of refugees, and

(b) Any other person, who is outside the country of his nationality or, if he has no nationality, the country of his former habitual residence, because he has or had well-founded fear of victimization by reason of his race, religion, nationality or political opinions and is unable or, because of such fear is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of the Government of the country of his nationality or, if he has no nationality, to return to the country of his former habitual residence;

Provided:

(1) That a person, who is a national of more than one country, shall not be considered to be a refugee within the meaning of the above paragraph unless he satisfies the provisions of that paragraph in relation to each of the countries of which he is a national or;

(2) That he is not a person who has entered a country with whose nationals he has close ties of ethnic and cultural kinship and because of this kinship, enjoys the rights and privileges usually attached to the possession of the nationality of such country or;

(3) Such person does not fall under the auspices of other organs or agencies of the United Nations or;

(4) That such person has not committed a crime covered by the provisions of treaties of extradition or a crime mentioned in Article VI of the London Charter of the International Military Tribunal or by the provisions of Article 14, paragraph 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights." Text ends.

1. The definition for the Draft Convention appears to be satisfactory.

2. As regards the definition for the Statute, we have the following comments to offer:

Paragraph (I). The last phrase "the High Commissioner shall request the opinion of the Advisory Council" seems to prejudge the establishment of such a Council or Committee. This is a separate question which will arise when the Committee considers part B of Chapter II of the Statute.

Paragraph (III). Section (B) para (3). The phrase "under the auspices of other organs or agencies" is not very clearly worded. There might, for instance, be a danger that no women could be considered refugees because they fall under the auspices of the Commission on the Status of Women. A further point is that the IRO will continue to exist until September 30, 1951. This paragraph might exclude all I.R.O. refugees from the High Commissioner's responsibility until next October which is probably not its intention.

Paragraph (III). Section (B) para (4). The wording could be improved by changing "by the provisions" to read "in the provisions" or something similar.

3. In general, your suggested amendments appear to be satisfactory. If the majority agree to the two resolutions as at present worded, the compromise achieved would be quite satisfactory.

Social Committee completed yesterday adoption of definitions for the Draft Convention and for Statute of High Commissioner.

2. Except for deletion of sub-paragraph 2 of paragraph C of definition for Draft Convention and for some other minor amendments, the Committee accepted the text of definition suggested by informal Working Party for the Draft Convention. The vote was 12 in favour, including Canada, 6 against and 21 abstentions.

3. The greater part of the definition proposed by the informal Working Party for insertion in the Draft Statute was also accepted by the Committee. Sub-paragraph B and C of paragraph 2 of the definition suggested by the Working Party had, however, to be re-worded to meet the objections of the Arab and some Far Eastern delegations. The final vote on the whole of this definition was 15 in favour, including Canada, 5 against and 17 abstentions. The complete text† of these definitions as adopted by the Third Committee is being forwarded to you under separate cover.

4. The delegations interested in the question of refugees were rather disappointed by the little support which these two definitions received from the members of the Committee, particularly in view of the fact that these definitions had been arrived at after much work by the informal Working Party and were the result of genuine efforts to reach a compromise formula which would be acceptable to the great majority. It may be, however, that several delegations did not have sufficient time to communicate with their respective Governments for instructions on these two compromise definitions which might explain the small number of affirmative votes thereon. Absence of strong opposition to any one of these two definitions might tend to confirm this view in which case it might be expected that the definitions would receive a wider support in the plenary meeting.

5. Unless advised to the contrary, it is our intention to vote in favour of these definitions when they come up in plenary.[69]

12. Mr. Ford. The General Assembly has adopted a Statute for the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. The Statute outlines the general principles, organization, powers, functions and competence of the High Commissioner's Office. In an accompanying resolution the Assembly has called upon all governments to cooperate with the High Commissioner in certain specified ways. In brief, the High Commissioner will endeavour to provide international protection for the refugees falling under his competence. A detailed set of criteria will enable him to determine what persons may claim his assistance.

13. The Assembly elected Dr. G.J. Van Heuven Goedhart as the first High Commissioner for Refugees. The only other candidate was Mr. J. Donald Kingsley, the present Director-General of the I.R.O. The Canadian Delegation supported Dr. Geodhart who received 30 votes. Mr. Kingsley received 24 votes. The new High Commissioner will commence his work on January 1, 1951.

14. The Assembly also approved the decision of the Social Committee, which was reported last week, to convene a conference of plenipotentiaries in Geneva for the final establishment and signature of the convention relating to the status of refugees and the protocol relating to the status of stateless persons. TENTH SESSION — ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL
(INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION)

It is important that at the Tenth Session of the Council, which marks the return of Canada after a one year absence, the Canadian Delegation should take an active part in the discussions and make a useful contribution to the work of the Session. The agenda is lengthy and varied and detailed instructions on each item are unnecessary. It is essential, however, that the Delegation be given general instructions which they can apply in discussion of individual items.

Recommendation

It is recommended that the attached memorandum of Draft Instructions to the Canadian Delegation be approved.[71]

LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Instructions provisoires pour la délégation canadienne à la dixième session du Conseil économique et social, New York, le 7 février 1950

Draft Instructions for the Canadian Delegation to the Tenth Session of the Economic and Social Council, New York, February 7, 1950

SECRET [Ottawa, February 1, 1950]

General

The fundamental principle which should guide the Delegation is the belief that the Economic and Social Council is a valuable potential instrument for international co-operation in meeting the world's economic and social problems. Its progress to date however has not been entirely satisfactory, partly because of the propaganda and obstructionist tactics of the Cominform members and partly because of the unrealistic attitude of certain other countries. If the Cominform Delegations participate in the 10th Session, the Canadian Delegation should do whatever is feasible to minimize the delaying effects of their interventions by attempting to have certain items referred to appropriate commissions or specialized agencies for consideration and by ignoring specific charges against Canada when these are patently for propaganda purposes and when the Canadian position has already been adequately defended. The Delegation should press for a realistic and sound approach to all problems and should subject all draft resolutions to a critical examination with a view to assessing their real value as against the expenses and administrative work involved.

Selection of Officers

In selecting officers for the Council, the Delegation should take into account the competence of the candidates, the advantage of previous experience and the general principle of reasonable geographical distribution.

Economic Questions

The debate on the world economic situation is expected to take the form of a general discussion of economic changes and trends and international commodity problems during the past year, and no specific resolutions or recommendations are anticipated. It will be necessary for the Canadian Delegation to make a statement; the Delegation will be equipped with recent information on economic developments and trends in Canada. Cominform countries may charge that Canada and the other capitalistic countries are faced by trade depression. A reasonably optimistic statement could be made regarding this country, and particularly regarding the prospects for imports from Europe.

The debate on Full Employment and Unemployment will be based on the Report of a Committee of Experts and the Recommendations of the Economic and Employment Commission concerning that Report. It is directed towards the desirable objective of maintaining employment at a high level, but makes recommendations for attaining this objective that must be viewed with caution, particularly in the light of past debates on the subject in various international bodies. As in the past, the Canadian Delegation should support the main objective and any measures likely to promote it, while opposing specific remedies that are unsuited to the economic position of Canada or to Canadian Government policies in domestic and foreign affairs.

The agenda includes an item on the financing of development in underdeveloped countries. The Cabinet has already given general approval to Canadian participation in the U.N. programme of technical assistance for the economic development of such countries. However, the Experts' Report (referred to above) makes specific recommendations for changing the Constitution of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund. Any resolution on these matters should be referred to Ottawa for instructions.

Social Questions

In the discussion of social questions, the Delegation, while supporting reasonable measures of international cooperation for the improvement of living standards, should discourage impractical proposals for ambitious welfare schemes.

If the report on UNICEF leads to a discussion of the future of that Organization, the Delegation could praise the excellent work accomplished by the Fund but should carefully avoid giving the impression that the Canadian Government favours its indefinite continuation. Reference will probably be made to the report of the survey, recently undertaken by a special committee, of the continuing needs of children. Further information is required on this subject and no decisive action is likely to be recommended by ECOSOC until its 11th Session. In any preliminary discussion that may take place, the Delegation should take care not to make any statement which might be interpreted as committing the Canadian Government to support of definite proposals in the future.

Administrative and Miscellaneous Questions

In the discussion of the item concerning implementation of recommendations on economic and social matters, the Delegation should support any practical proposals which would simplify the system of reporting by member governments and the procedure for consideration of these reports by the Council. They should be guided, however, by the principle that reports from governments on the extent to which they have implemented United Nations resolutions and recommendations serve the dual purpose of making it possible to evaluate the usefulness of resolutions and of reducing the number of irresponsible resolutions.

In the general consideration of the work of functional agencies, the Delegation should support proposals for better coordination of the agencies provided that schemes for coordination do not permit those countries which are not members of the agencies to secure indirect influence over their activities.

As the Council Session proceeds, questions will arise in regard both to subjects mentioned in this memorandum and to others in the agenda concerning which the Delegation will require guidance. On such points the Delegation should communicate with Ottawa for further instruction.

Memorandum from Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], March 1, 1950

I think you might be interested in looking at the attached memorandum, prepared by Mr. Chance, about the recent meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee on Statelessness and Related Problems, over which Mr. Chance presided at Lake Success. This memorandum is not a report on the meetings of the Committee but rather a note on the great difference in attitude which Mr. Chance observed between those countries which are close to the refugee problem e.g. France, Belgium, Denmark and the United Kingdom, and those countries which like ourselves are separated from it by oceans. Mr. Chance thought that the attitude of the European countries, as he observed it during the meeting of the Committee, was more liberal and humane and generous than our own.

I suggest that you might like to send copies of this brief memorandum both to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and to the Acting Minister of Labour.[72]

E. R[EID]

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Note du chef de la Direction des affaires consulaires pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Head, Consular Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], February 22, 1950

In accordance with the instructions contained in your letter of January 14, 1950, I went to Lake Success to attend, as Canadian representative, the meetings of the "Ad Hoc Committee on Statelessness and Related Problems" set up under the resolution of the Economic and Social Council.

2. As I have already reported in a previous communication,† I found myself to be already the choice of the Committee for its Chairman before the Committee had in fact sat. I protested my inability to remain throughout the full session of the Committee, but felt that it would be almost churlish to refuse to take the chair when, in fact, the choices were very limited. In the event I remained as Chairman until all the work of the Committee was done.

3. The Committee began its work on Tuesday, January 17, and finished on Thursday, February 16. I spent the following day with the Secretariat, reviewing and putting the finishing touches to the Report.

4. During this time, and in circumstances which could scarcely be more unsuitable for such a task, the Committee produced (a) a draft convention on the status of refugees; (b) a draft protocol to the convention, which at discretion of governments would enable them to apply certain specified articles of the convention to stateless persons who are not refugees; (c) a draft resolution for the Economic and Social Council dealing with the question of the elimination of statelessness.

5. Unless you instruct me to the contrary, I do not propose to deal at length with the work of the Committee by separate report for departmental use. The report of the Committee will be in the hands of governments in the course of the next ten days. It is complete and self-explanatory. I think it preferable to allow the work of the Committee and, ipso facto, my own, to stand (or fall) by the report.

6. There is, however, one aspect of the work of the Committee to which I think attention might be directed. I was struck throughout by the great difference in attitude between those countries who are close to the refugee problem — France, Belgium, Denmark, the United Kingdom — and those countries, who like ourselves, are separated from it by oceans. The attitude of the European countries is more liberal, humane and generous than our own. The French, in particular, took a very high line indeed and have translated this idealism into practical action. This is true, in varying degree, of Belgium, Denmark and the United Kingdom. What might be called the trans-Atlantic attitude is exemplified by the United States. The young representative of the State Department, Mr. Louis Henkin, was exceedingly competent and helpful throughout the work of the Committee. At the conclusion, however, he found himself under instructions to make, presumably for the benefit of some Senators, a statement to the effect that there were no refugees in the United States of America, and that if all countries were like the United States, there would of course be no need for a convention such as this. They had taken part in the discussions merely to show their willingness to assist and co-operate in U.N. activities, but they reserved their position with regard to the convention as a whole. This rather self-righteous and unnecessary statement had an exceedingly irritating effect upon the Committee in general. Members did not hesitate to point out to me informally that this sort of thing was objectionable to them, that we on this side of the Atlantic only admitted those refugees whom we were prepared to accept, and that there was little or no humanitarianism in our attitude to the problem. I am bound to say that, in my opinion, there is some justification for this feeling.

[72] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Yes L.B. P[earson]

7. I mention this aspect of the matter because we are confronted with the I.R.O. hard core problem and the disappearance soon from the scene of the I.R.O. machinery. It may be difficult from the point of view of sheer practical politics to take a more liberal view than has been taken up to the present, but one could not be associated with the members of this Committee for a period of five weeks without feeling some sympathy for their view that we might be a little more liberal and generous in this matter.

8. I was assisted as Canadian representative on the Committee for three weeks by Mr. Ross Winter of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. He was, during his stay, exceedingly helpful. Apart from having a good knowledge of the problems involved, Mr. Winter is a man of liberal education. He possesses considerable social gifts, which enabled him to be a valuable assistant to the Chairman in the reconciliation of differing points of view.

GENERAL REVIEW OF THE TENTH SESSION

The 10th Session of the Economic and Social Council was the shortest session to date. There were certain special reasons for this situation, primarily of course, the absence of the Soviet and satellite representatives. An important reason, however, which ought not to be forgotten is that the agenda was slight. There was in the first place a lengthy enough provisional agenda, but it contained few matters on which crucial decisions of policy or organization were involved. The agenda, and therefore the length of the session, were reduced to some extent by the bold work of the Agenda Committee, which made more than its usual number of decisive recommendations. The deferment to the 12th Session, for instance, of the inchoate proposal for a study of world oil resources forestalled what could have been a difficult debate leading to useless or risky conclusions. Certain other items which normally would have taken up a great deal of the Council's time were also deferred until later sessions or referred to other bodies for action. These included 'The Problems of Economic Development and Social Progress of the former Italian Colonies,' 'International Reduction of Working Hours' and 'Abolition of Discriminatory Measures of an Economic and Social Character from which Workers Suffer on Grounds of Race and Colour.' Unfortunately the Council's work for 1950 has not been evenly divided between the 10th and 11th sessions. This unbalance can be attributed almost entirely to bad luck rather than to bad planning. It so happened that important subjects such as Full Employment and the Technical Assistance Program had reached stages in which nothing much could be done by the Council until other important decisions had been reached elsewhere. The report of the Committee of Experts on Full Employment required further consideration by governments and the Technical Assistance Conference to be convened by the Secretary-General had not yet taken place. At the same time important organizational decisions such as the post-IRO care of refugees and the post-UNICEF care of children could not be taken until after these problems had been examined in detail in other bodies. As a result, the coming summer session of the Council at Geneva will be faced with an extremely heavy and exacting agenda which will require many more meetings even if the Soviet delegations are still absent.

2. The withdrawal of the Soviet, Polish, and Czechoslovak members at the beginning of the session had an interesting effect on the work of the Council. On the whole the Council increased its stature by the sane attitude displayed by members under the circumstances. There was never the slightest suggestion that the Council should do other than proceed with its business, however regrettable it might be that there was not a full complement of members. On the other hand, there was no disposition to exploit unduly the opportunity for passing resolutions or reaching decisions which might have been more difficult to secure with the Communist representatives present. It is true that the United Kingdom Delegation and others who supported the drastic removal of the right of non-governmental organizations to place items on the agenda argued privately that this was a heaven-sent opportunity to reach a decision which would be vigorously opposed by the Soviet Union. They had, however, determined upon this policy before it became clear that the Communists would be absent, and they merely used their absence as an additional argument to secure support. It is probably true that one of the reasons for the adoption of a less drastic type of proposal along the lines suggested informally by the Canadian Delegation was the belief that the Council ought not to give the Slav representatives the opportunity of charging us with cowardice in taking advantage of their absence. However, the fundamental reason which prompted most delegations to support a compromise was that the time was not yet ripe, on the basis of past experience, for the Council to withdraw outright the agenda privilege simply because it had been abused by a small number of NGO's and in particular by the WFTU.

3. Representatives at various times, it is true, attacked the attitude of the Soviet Government, or rather of international Stalinism, and there were occasional ironic references to the absence of these representatives. Whatever criticism there was of the policy of the Soviet Union — and some of it was very vigorous — was provoked for the most part by the statements of the representatives of the World Federation of Trade Unions. If the representatives of the WFTU had followed their masters out of the Council rather than remain behind to act as their mouth-piece, it is possible that the views of the Soviet Government would have been almost entirely ignored during the Council. This situation on the whole would have been better for the Soviet Union, as the WFTU contributions seemed even more preposterous than usual before a Council which was notable for the restraint, tolerance, and compromise which characterized its discussions.

4. The absence of the "opposition" did, of course, lay the Council open to the criticism that its session was "unreal"; that it had achieved something in the nature of harmony only by isolation from the major problem of our times. This impression of unreality was perhaps heightened by the performance of Dr. Chang, the Chinese Representative, whose windy rhetoric seemed peculiarly inappropriate to the position of his government. In answer to this charge of unreality, it can honestly be said that the Council accomplished with more despatch quite as much as, and probably more than, it would have accomplished with the Soviet delegations present.

5. In spite of the absence of the usual "opposition", the Council was by no means without division of opinion. Perhaps the most recognizable division of opinion was between the well-developed and the underdeveloped countries. There was no doubt that India was the spokesman of the underdeveloped countries, supported usually, but not always, by Pakistan (which occasionally attempted to seize the initiative, but as a new member of the Council found it not very easy to compete with so experienced a representative as Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar).[73] Support for what might be called the underdeveloped viewpoints came also from Mexico, Chile, Brazil, China and Iran, on occasions. The divergence, however, between the well-developed and the underdeveloped was by no means so sharp as might have been anticipated, and there were in fact so few clear-cut votes on this subject that one could not definitely divide the members into two parties. The most notable statement of the views of the underdeveloped countries was Sir Ramaswami's remarkably moving address on the work of the Bank and Fund. On the other hand, the most useful speech was probably that made by the Representative of Pakistan in the discussion of the financing of economic development. The noteworthy quality of his speech was that it was a constructive analysis of the needs of Pakistan and the efforts taken by the Government of Pakistan to make the best use of technical assistance. This speech, which opened the discussion on the subject, set the tone for the debate on which the principal clash of opinions might have been expected. In fact, perhaps the sharpest clash between these two groups was on what was expected to be a minor item, the proposal of the World Federation of United Nations Associations for an economic survey of Africa. The Indian Delegation, supported less energetically by several others was prepared to accept a modest proposal, but not a decision which shelved the issue without recognizing that some attention must be paid to the needs of this large continent of non-Europeans. Even on this issue, however, the spirit of compromise which characterized Council meetings was evident. The French, Belgians and British, who were particularly worried as to what might be done in Africa, spend some days trying behind the scenes to reach a compromise agreement with the Indians and probably would have done so if instructions to stand firm had not come from Delhi.

6. The differences between the well-developed and the underdeveloped countries might have been accentuated by the fact that the Communist states were not present to force all other nations into unity. In fact, however, it was the absence of the Communists which set a reasonable tone in the Council that softened tempers and blunted the edges of controversy. The Communist spokesmen of the WFTU failed to provoke friction among the members of the Council. It was the representatives of India and Chile, not the United States, who made the most blistering attacks on the WFTU, the latter having been sufficiently inept to submit during the conference a series of further charges of violation of the rights of working men, directed particularly against the governments of the underdeveloped countries themselves.

7. Perhaps the most useful work of the 10th Session was in clarifying certain aspects of its structure on the basis of the first four years' experience. The Council took steps with regard to the implementation of recommendations on economic and social matters which should lead to more effective and more willing cooperation on the part of member governments. At the same time, it took steps to rectify the initial error of according too wide privileges to the non-governmental organizations. This improvement might be expected not only to assist the work of the Council by allowing it to concentrate on important matters but also to lead the NGO's themselves to make a more helpful contribution. Feeling against the NGO's (and by no means solely against the WFTU) was strong at the beginning of the session. The A.F. of L. and the WFUNA had not strengthened their positions by placing on the provisional agenda items which seemed irrelevant or inappropriate, and it cannot be said that the representative of the A.F. of L. gained much credit by delivering a speech highly propagandistic in tone on forced labour which was immediately countered by the WFTU in similar terms. (There was some reason to accuse the Chairman of discrimination in that he allowed Miss Sender[74] to use abusive language while he continually called to order the WFTU spokesman for similar misdemeanours). The WFUNA representative did retrieve his position somewhat by making a reasonable case for the economic survey of Africa proposed by his organization. There was not a very large representation of NGO's at the Council and few of them spoke in the Council itself. There is good reason to hope that the critical comments made in the Council; the threat, which almost succeeded, to remove entirely the privilege of placing items on the agenda; as well as the considerable tightening up of the process which was actually approved; will give the NGO's, or at least those leaders responsible for their policy towards the United Nations, cause for sober thought.

[74] Toni Sender, représentante de l'American Federation of Labour.
Toni Sender, Representative of the American Federation of Labour.

8. One minor matter with respect to the organizational structure of ECOSOC might be mentioned. The 10th Session was for the most part confined to plenary sessions. There were thirty of these. The Social Committee met only eight times and the Economic Committee twice. The Coordinating Committee did not meet at all, as matters which might otherwise have been dealt with by that body were disposed of in plenary. On the particular insistence of the United States representative, it was made clear that the organization of this session was not intended to set a precedent. The Coordinating Committee will almost certainly be reestablished at the Geneva Session in the summer, and it is probable that at that time the Economic and Social Committees will be considerably more active than they were at the 10th Session.

9. Mr. Santa Cruz as Chairman showed the results of his long experience. He was decisive and affable, and his rulings were on the whole responsible. Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar had little opportunity to sit in the Chair, as the Economic Committee met very seldom, but on those few occasions he showed his usual mastery. M. Dehousse spent only slightly more time in the chair and in spite of a few errors of judgment when speaking as the Belgian representative, he showed signs of being a fairly effective Chairman for the 11th Session.

10. Under the guidance of the Chairman the Council was never pressed very hard. There were neither night sessions nor Saturday morning sessions, and regular sessions were on a few occasions shortened or called off for questionable reasons. The Chairman did not hide the fact in private conversation that he wanted the session to last a month. He and some other members of the Council were nervous after the first few days lest the session end in such a short time that it might be charged that it had been able to accomplish nothing in the absence of the Eastern European representatives. He was anxious on the other hand that it should be briefer than usual, in order to prove that the Council could work more effectively if it were not for the obstructive tactics of the Communists. The wisdom of deliberately prolonging the Council was questioned by the Canadian Delegation. If the Chairman's determination to end the Council almost exactly four weeks from the day it began had led to an undue prolongation, the prestige of the Council might well have suffered. In fact, however, the length of the session could probably not have been reduced by more than a week if the Council had worked throughout at a normal pace, and no real damage was done. The leisurely pace at which the Council pursued its activities was not, in any case, entirely due to the delaying tactics of the Chairman. A contributing factor of equal if not greater significance was to be found in the arrangements made for the reproduction and distribution of documents. The documentation section of the Secretariat had been geared to a certain speed which did not prove adequate to the increased tempo at which the Council at its tenth session disposed of the various items on the agenda. Even if the Chairman had not deliberately prolonged the session, the Council would frequently have been obliged to adjourn for want of documents relating to the next item.

11. In spite of the absence of important or startling achievements at the tenth session, the Council was able by its business-like methods and its increasing maturity, to give reasonable grounds for hope that it is developing into the Board of Directors it was intended to be. For instance, important decisions were taken concerning the machinery to be used by the United Nations for investigating alleged infringements of trade union rights. General endorsement was also given to the programme of work recommended by its Social Commission. The despatch with which this item was treated by the Council did not mean that it was not important. On the contrary, the Council approved the continuance of the very important work undertaken by the Social Commission in fields where the United Nations has already demonstrated its ability to be useful and constructive. These include 'prevention of crime', 'rehabilitation of delinquents', 'child and youth welfare', 'advisory social welfare services' and the 'rehabilitation of the disabled'. The whole economic and social machine is beginning to work. The earlier days of experiment and initiation are passing into a phase when the Council and the bodies for which it is responsible are slowly getting down to business.

12. The Council is in fact entering upon a critical period which will determine the role it is to play in the international economic and social field. Whether it will emerge as an international instrument for the solution of the world's economic and social problems, as well as a coordinating agency, a board of directors and a forum for exchange of views will depend in large measure on the manner in which it faces up to its responsibilities in the next year or two. If it is to be effective in the broad field of the promotion of conditions favourable to economic progress and higher standards of living, it must not be allowed to mark time or to fall into lethargy. In the final analysis, the success or failure of the Council in attaining its major objectives will be governed by the extent to which national governments are prepared to carry out its recommendations and proposals.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 159-50 Ottawa, June 9, 1950

COMPOSITION OF THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL, GENEVA, JULY 3 TO AUGUST 16, 1950

It seems likely that the eleventh session of the Economic and Social Council will be of more than usual importance.

2. The Council has passed through the organizational phase and the pattern of its continuing activities is beginning to emerge. The coming session offers a good opportunity for the Canadian Delegation to take stock of the value of the Council's work in the international economic and social field with a view to determining the role which Canada should play in its activities during the remainder of the Canadian term of membership.

3. The agenda for the eleventh session contains several important items which have already been given preliminary consideration and on which definite decisions will probably be taken.

4. The absence of the Cominform representatives should make it possible for the Council to do more productive work than in normal circumstances, when propaganda debates divert the energies of the Western members away from the fundamental purposes for which the Council was established.

5. The attached memorandum attempts to assess in some detail the importance of the eleventh session. It was prepared in the Department of External Affairs and has been discussed with officials of the Departments of Finance, Trade and Commerce, National Health and Welfare and the Bank of Canada, who are in general agreement with the views it contains.

6. A decision is now required on the composition of the Canadian Delegation to the eleventh session of the Council. It is recommended that the Delegation be headed by a Cabinet Minister and that it include two senior alternates, one on economic questions and one on social questions.[75]

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 26, 1950

ASSESSMENT OF THE IMPORTANCE OF THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL
GENEVA, JULY 3 TO AUGUST 16, 1950

There are several reasons why the eleventh session of ECOSOC is of particular importance. Some of these reasons are of a general nature and relate to the past record of the Council, its proper role in the field of international economic and social activities, and Canada's future relationship with it. Other reasons, some of which are linked with these general considerations, are based on specific issues which will be debated at the coming session.

2. The Council has now reached the stage in its development where a serious and objective assessment should be made by us of its achievements and its future usefulness. Such an analysis could not, and indeed should not, have been undertaken by us up to the present. During our first term of membership (1946-48), the Council was preoccupied with the task of working out its organizational and procedural problems and its co-ordinating machinery. We did not belong to the Council in 1949. The tenth session (February-March, 1950) could hardly be used as a basis for judgment of the value of the organization since most of the items dealt with concerned matters of a continuing nature on which a sort of progress report was all that could be expected, while the larger issues received only preliminary consideration because further preparatory work was required before definite conclusions could be reached.

3. A review of the first ten sessions shows that the Council has achieved a certain measure of success in co-ordinating the activities of the specialized agencies, has initiated a number of worthwhile studies and has provided a useful forum for exchange of views. However, its slim record of practical results raises some misgivings as to its usefulness as an effective international instrument for assisting in the solution of the world's economic and social problems, the task with which it is charged by the United Nations Charter.

4. While the tenth session made little progress in dealing with the important issues before it, the Council could adduce in each case a reasonable excuse for marking time. The Technical Assistance Conference[76] had not been held and there was not much the Council could do in developing the technical assistance programme in the meantime. The Experts Report on full employment had not been circulated in time to allow governments to give it detailed study and the Council could legitimately decide to defer final action until the eleventh session. The decision to refer the issue of the financing of economic development to a sub-commission of the Economic and Employment Commission was perhaps less justifiable, but the manoeuvre succeeded in postponing action. These delaying tactics, however, cannot continue indefinitely without resulting in serious loss of prestige and at the eleventh session the Council will find it very difficult to avoid taking some definite action.

5. The Technical Assistance Committee will meet in Geneva concurrently with the Council for approximately the first fortnight of the session. The membership of the T.A.C. is identical with that of ECOSOC. The expanded programme of technical assistance is the most important, perhaps the only worthwhile accomplishment of the Council in the economic field to date. If it works in practice, it will of itself justify the existence of ECOSOC. But it has not yet gone beyond the blueprint stage. The first meeting of the T.A.C. will, to a large extent, determine the successful implementation of the programme at least in its initial period. It is therefore extremely important that sound precedents be established at this meeting and that everything possible be done by the responsible members of the Council to discourage impractical, over-ambitious development schemes and to ensure efficient and economical administration. We have in the T.A.C. the opportunity as well as the responsibility of scrutinizing specific projects and requests, helping to ensure efficient co-ordination and in general throwing our weight on the side of a sound, sensible programme.

6. Full employment has already been discussed exhaustively in the Council. At the tenth session, the Council passed a resolution, specifically charging its members to be prepared at the eleventh session to give their views on the particular recommendations of the experts and to offer any alternative proposals they might have. It will therefore be difficult for the Canadian delegation to avoid taking a position on each specific measure, national or international, recommended by the experts, and on any alternative proposals put forward by other governments. It may also be desirable for the Canadian delegation to put forward alternative proposals of its own in order to avoid criticism at home for following an unconstructive, negative line on a question of vital importance to Canadians.

7. Some sort of resolution or recommendation on full employment is almost certain to emerge from this session. Such a resolution could be embarrassing to the Canadian Government. The whole question of employment in Canada has important political implications and our participation in the Council debate and decision will require expert knowledge and skilful handling.

8. The item on methods of financing economic development will be considered in the light of the report prepared by the sub-commission on economic development. The report is not yet available, but we can be certain that, regardless of the content of this document, the under-developed countries will press for some means of obtaining substantial investment capital. They maintain that the technical assistance programme will be sterile if capital is not available for the economic development which would follow technical assistance. They may be expected to urge revision of the articles of agreement of the International Bank. The real significance of the debate on financing of economic development will perhaps be political rather than economic. It is unlikely that the Council will recommend revision of the Bank's articles of agreement or any other specific measures to increase the flow of capital to under-developed countries. (This prediction assumes that the sub-commission's report will not contain acceptable proposals.) On the other hand, it is important not to strengthen the impression which already exists among the under-developed countries that their efforts to improve their economic conditions are meeting with an unsympathetic response from capitalist countries. While the Cominform representatives sat in the Council, the other members tended to form a common front. This external unifying influence having been removed for the time being, the line between the developed and under-developed countries is becoming more clearly defined. It would be unfortunate if this tendency were to develop and an issue such as the financing of economic development where there is considerable conflict of interests will have to be handled very carefully.

9. Another important item which has been put off until the eleventh session is the establishment of permanent machinery within the United Nations for assistance to under-privileged children. The Social Commission has worked out a plan which it proposes that ECOSOC should recommend to the Assembly. The Council will therefore have to take a decision on this matter and we can expect a wide difference of opinion on what the United Nations should do for children. The financial implications of this decision may be large.

10. One of the items which will probably involve considerable work and which could lead to important results is the proliferation and over-lapping of the programmes of the specialized agencies and the United Nations. The General Assembly has charged the Council with the task of reviewing the catalogue of economic and social projects of the agencies and the United Nations and of recommending categories of priorities. While it is undoubtedly true that more efficient co-ordination is essential to avoid unnecessary duplication of the activities of various United Nations organs, the problem is a complex one and its solution will not be advanced by the adoption by ECOSOC of over-simplified proposals. We have received an unofficial report that the Brazilians may propose amalgamating the budgets of the United Nations and all the specialized agencies and doling out funds from the common budget for approved programmes. Any proposal along these lines would, of course, meet with strong opposition from many quarters.

11. The draft Covenant on Human Rights is also to be considered at the eleventh session and the Council has been requested by the Commission to submit the Covenant to the Assembly at its fifth session. Whether or not the Council undertakes a detailed textual study of the draft, it must take decisions on the submission of the Covenant to the Assembly, the drafting of a federal-state clause and a colonial application clause, the inclusion or omission of economic and social rights and the submission to the Assembly of a recommendation made by the Commission for a separate convention on freedom of information.

12. On all of these larger issues, the Canadian delegation should be in a position to make a positive, constructive contribution. Our acceptance of membership in the Council carries responsibilities which we should do our best to fulfil. With a strong delegation composed of members who understand the issues thoroughly, who can speak authoritatively, and who can cooperate effectively with the United Kingdom, United States and other sensible delegations, we may be able to exert a healthy influence on the more impractical and visionary members of the Council. Moreover, if it is agreed that we should at the close of this session take stock of the Council and its work, with particular reference to the role which Canada should play in it during the remainder of its three-year term of membership, it is important that the evaluation be made by senior officials familiar with all the issues and principles involved in such an assessment, whose judgment will be sound, objective and based on wide knowledge.

13. A logical approach to the task of evaluation would be to review the Canadian attitude toward the Council when it was first established and to determine how far that attitude should be modified in the light of the first five years' experience. The following excerpts from a statement made by the Honourable Paul Martin before the Economic and Social Council on January 29, 1946, indicate the line which the Government took at that time toward the functions and aims of the Council:

> "... there are few tasks concerning the United Nations of more vital importance than those to be undertaken by this Council. We represent, one might say, the positive side of the work of the Organization. Our task is not so much to prevent as to do, not so much to avoid the undesirable as to accomplish the good."
>
> "The Charter assigns two types of functions to the Economic and Social Council: the function of recommendation, including study, and the function of co-ordination. The Council is not an executive agency in the ordinary sense of the word. The actions taken to accomplish the high purposes set out in article 55 of the Charter ... are actions which will be taken by national governments and by those specialized agencies which have executive functions."
>
> "More positively, it will be our task to see that through our commissions and committees the best in modern knowledge and modern science is made available to all parts of the world. It will be our task to see that help, in the way of expert knowledge and advice, is provided to all Members of the Organization who wish to have it, and those great tasks which can only be undertaken by co-operative action among nations are effectively initiated and effectively carried through."
>
> "On the other hand, it does seem to us of basic importance that the United Nations and the Economic and Social Council should hold the position of the central body in the whole constellation of inter-governmental institutions concerned with economic and social problems. We feel that the task of co-ordination is extremely important."

CONFIDENTIAL

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF ECOSOC GENEVA, JULY 3 TO AUGUST 16

GENERAL

1. The eleventh session of ECOSOC provides an opportunity to assess the value of the work being done in the international economic and social field by this organ of the United Nations, the functions which it can most usefully fulfil in the future and the role which Canada should play in its development. During the last four years, the Council has worked out its organizational and procedural arrangements and its co-ordinating machinery, has initiated various studies and has engaged in many debates on economic and social subjects of universal significance. The time has now come to take stock of these various activities and to decide which of them are effective, which can be improved and which are clearly unprofitable, at least in the immediate future.

2. The importance of ECOSOC as a central co-ordinating body for all the activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies in the economic and social field was stressed by Canada at the very inception of the Council. Considerable progress has been made in this direction and the delegation should encourage the trend towards efficient co-ordination without losing sight of the necessity of preserving the semi-autonomous character of the specialized agencies.

3. While the Council's general discussions on broad problems have served a useful purpose in providing a forum for exchange of views and in promoting several worthwhile studies and reports, the delegation should discourage the tendency to continue these discussions beyond the point where they are profitable. It must be recognized, as was emphasized by the Canadian delegate to the first session of ECOSOC, that the Council is not an executive agency and that the actions taken to accomplish the aims set forth in article 55 of the Charter of the United Nations will, in the final analysis, have to be taken by national governments and by those specialized agencies which have executive functions.

4. At the tenth session of the Council, the proceedings were deliberately slowed down by the Chairman in order that the meeting might last the customary length of time. The Chairman apparently considered that the prestige of the Council would be lowered by an unusually short session. The agenda for the eleventh session is a heavy one and it may not be possible to complete it in less than the scheduled six weeks. Any attempt, however, to draw out the session longer than is strictly necessary to accomplish its duties efficiently should be vigorously resisted by the Canadian delegation. The Communist members will probably not be present at this session of the Council. The opportunity should be taken to show that the Council is capable of carrying on its business efficiently and expeditiously when it is not hampered by the futile and time-consuming propaganda debates provoked by the Communist representatives.

ECONOMIC QUESTIONS

Technical Assistance for Economic Development

5. The Technical Assistance Committee will meet in Geneva concurrently with ECOSOC. The Committee will have the responsibility of scrutinizing the projects for technical assistance submitted by the under-developed countries and for recommending approved projects to the Council. It is extremely important that at this first meeting of the T.A.C., sound precedents be established and everything possible be done by the responsible members of the Council to discourage impractical, over-ambitious development schemes and to ensure efficient and economical administration. The Canadian delegation should be guided by these basic considerations in judging the merits of specific requests for technical assistance.

Financing of Economic Development

6. Representatives of the under-developed countries may be expected to press at the eleventh session, as they have done in the past, for measures to be taken by the International Bank and by capital exporting countries to facilitate the flow of investment capital for the economic development of their areas. A special study on methods of financing economic development has been undertaken by the sub-commission on economic development and its report will form the basis for discussion in the Council. The sub-commission has drafted several resolutions for the approval of ECOSOC, most of which recommend measures which might be taken to increase domestic capital for investment purposes. The resolutions are generally unobjectionable and, except for a few reservations, can be accepted by the Delegation. The Delegation might suggest that the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance could contribute to the encouragement of domestic and foreign capital investment by helping the under-developed countries to develop adequate financial institutions and sound fiscal policies.

Full Employment

7. The Experts Report on national and international measures for full employment will form the basis for discussion of this item in the Council. The Experts Report has been carefully studied by the government departments concerned and a detailed memorandum has been prepared for inclusion in the commentary for the guidance of the Delegation. The recommendations of the Experts in both the national and international fields are based upon the adoption of rigid standards and the automatic application of specific measures agreed upon in advance. The Canadian Government considers that the maintenance of full employment is much too complex a problem to be solved by the universal acceptance of a rigid set of standards and controls, and believes that this problem can only be met by a series of judgments to determine the appropriate measures to be taken in the prevailing circumstances at any particular time.

8. In order to avoid giving the impression that the Canadian Government is taking a negative attitude towards methods to promote full employment, the Delegation should stress the active concern of the government with the maintenance of a high level of employment in Canada and to that end should outline the measures carried out or provided for to deal with employment problems in Canada.

9. The Delegation should also draw the attention of the Council to the ILO report on "Action Against Unemployment" and express general approval of this study. The ILO report presents several recommended courses of action for dealing with problems of unemployment, and national governments may well find some of the conclusions in the ILO report applicable to their own situation.

SOCIAL QUESTIONS

10. In the social aspects of its work, ECOSOC has achieved a considerable measure of success. There appears to be a growing tendency, however, on the part of certain members of the Council to expect the U.N. to assume responsibility for extensive welfare schemes which are well beyond a reasonable estimate of the budgetary resources of the U.N. Therefore, while the Canadian delegation should encourage and support sound workable projects for the improvement of social conditions throughout the world and should make clear the concern of the Canadian Government and people for the welfare of less fortunate populations, every effort should be made to discourage unrealistic, extravagant schemes which cannot be carried out and which only add to the distress of the under-privileged by raising false hopes.

Long-range Activities for Children

11. On April 27 the Cabinet approved the principles contained in the Secretary-General's recommendations for permanent machinery within the U.N. to carry out long-range activities for children. The delegation should make every effort to ensure that the plan approved by the Council is in conformity with the principles set forth in the Secretary-General's recommendations.

Draft Covenant on Human Rights

12. The Commission on Human Rights has completed a draft text of an international covenant on human rights which has been submitted to the Council for its consideration. A separate memorandum† is being submitted to Cabinet on this matter.

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Election to the Functional Commissions

13. At the eleventh session, the Council will elect one-third of the membership of eight functional commissions. Countries are elected as nominating states and the persons they designate to serve on the commissions act in their capacity as individual experts and not as official representatives of their governments. The decision on particular nominating states to be supported in the elections is best left to the delegation to take on the spot in consultation with other delegations.

14. The delegation should resist any attempt to use the withdrawal of the Cominform states from the Council and its subsidiary bodies as an excuse for not electing these countries, as nominating states, to the functional commissions since it must be assumed that the absence of the Cominform members of the U.N. is temporary. The delegation should therefore be guided by the general principle of adequate geographical representation and should vote for a reasonable proportion of Slavic countries on the functional commissions.

15. Canada is now a member of four functional commissions, but on one of these, the Social Commission, its term expires at the end of 1950. The delegation should not seek Canada's election to any particular commission, but if inquiries are made, it could say that Canada would be glad to accept re-election to the Social Commission and election to the Statistical Commission, Canada would prefer not to be elected to other commissions.

The Sub-commissions of the Economic and Employment Commission

16. The Economic and Employment Commission at its fourth session recommended the abolition of its two sub-commissions. The Council considered the Commission's recommendation at its ninth session, but postponed a decision until the eleventh session. The Canadian position is that these sub-commissions have not accomplished any worthwhile results and their continued existence is unjustified. The delegation should therefore strongly support the move to abolish them.[77]

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 182-50 Ottawa, July 18, 1950

RESTRICTED

1. Purpose

The Economic and Social Council now sitting at Geneva is about to undertake two related matters concerning refugees:

(a) Consideration of the Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Statelessness and Related Problems

(b) The drafting of a Resolution of the General Assembly outlining the scope of the activities of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

[77] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 21 juin 1950./Approved by Cabinet, June 21, 1950.

No definitive action committing Canada will be taken by ECOSOC but it is desirable to give general guidance to the Canadian Delegation. This paper makes recommendations to that end.

2. Discussion

(a) The Ad Hoc Committee incorporated in its Report a draft Convention on refugees and a proposed protocol on stateless persons. The distinction is explained by the fact that while most refugees are stateless there are many stateless persons who are not refugees. The draft Convention is the more important of the two documents. It confers no material assistance benefits; it seeks only to set out a charter of minimum decencies which contracting states would accord to refugees within their borders. Its text and that of the protocol have been submitted to interested Departments of Government. With the exception of a few minor observations no objection has been raised.

(b) In the discussion which will arise in ECOSOC on both points referred to at para. 1 above, there is likely to be one essential difference of opinion, namely, the definition of the term "refugee". Both with regard to the draft Convention and the activities of the High Commissioner the United States have pressed for a definition based on categories of known refugees, leaving to the General Assembly to add other classes as may be necessary from time to time. The United Kingdom and France have led the case for a wider and more general definition. They are reported to have agreed upon a formula along the following lines:

> "A person who is outside his country of nationality or previous habitual residence who is unable or unwilling owing to fear of persecution to avail himself of the protection of the authorities of that country and who has not yet acquired a new nationality."

Since, as stated, the draft Convention confers no material assistance benefits and as it is proposed that the High Commissioner should confine his activities to the protection of the legal and welfare interests of refugees, there is little reason to oppose the more general type of definition.

(c) Both in the application of the Convention and in the responsibilities of the High Commissioner it will be necessary to decide who will determine whether or not a particular individual is a refugee within whatever definition is finally agreed upon. The United States seem to prefer that the decision be made by the High Commissioner; the United Kingdom inclines to the view that the decision should rest with the contracting state in which the individual happens to be or to which he seeks entry. The latter proposal is considered to be the more acceptable to Canada.

(d) The draft Convention provides for travel documents to be issued to refugees. The proposed form provides that a contracting state will re-admit the bearer of such a document within a given period of months at the discretion of the issuing state. It has never been Canadian practice to guarantee re-admission to anyone not possessing the immigration status of "returning Canadian". But Canada already has a working agreement with the United States to readmit persons with the status of landed immigrants within twelve months. The proposal of the travel document, therefore, while it involves an administrative change does not constitute a precedent and without a re-admission provision such a document is of little value.

(e) The draft Convention would require contracting states not to expel a refugee lawfully in its territory "save on grounds of national security and public order". The law of Canada provides mandatory deportation on certain grounds. In fact, however, deportation is modified by (i) the country of origin may refuse to accept the proposed deportee (ii) the punishment might be out of proportion to the crime. The law is administered in the light of these considerations and the difficulties presented by this article of the Convention are more apparent than real.

(f) No Federal State article appears in the draft Convention. The omission is due solely to lack of final agreement upon a standard clause of this kind for all appropriate United Nations instruments.

(g) The Ad Hoc Committee recommended that ECOSOC "Consider the Report and comments thereon (from governments) and submit these along with its recommendations to a diplomatic conference which it would convene for the purpose of further review of the draft Convention and protocol and at which these would be open for signature." This seems to be the most reasonable and expeditious course. Governments would have full opportunity for consideration before final signature.

3. Recommendations

(a) That the Canadian Delegation to ECOSOC be authorized to support in general terms both the draft Convention and the protocol.

(b) That in discussion on the definition article of the Convention and in regard to the duties of the High Commissioner the Delegation support the broader definition set out at para. 2 (b) above. The Delegation, however, should use discretion in pressing for acceptance of such a formula lest acceptance of the Convention as a whole be jeopardized by disagreement on the definition.

(c) That the Delegation support the proposition at 2 (c) above that determination of the application of the definition of "refugee" be left to the contracting state in which the refugee happens to be or to which he seeks admission.

(d) That the Delegation support the recommendation of the Ad Hoc Committee regarding further action on the Convention and protocol with the added suggestion that it might be desirable to reassemble the Ad Hoc Committee or at least some of its members as a preliminary Commission immediately prior to the proposed diplomatic conference.[78]

Extract from Report of the Canadian Delegation to the Eleventh Session of the Economic and Social Council, Geneva, July 2 to August 17, 1950

GENERAL SURVEY OF THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF ECOSOC

1. The 11th Session opened a few days after the Communist attack on the Republic of Korea. This situation raised for the first time the question of the desirability of implementing in some form Article 65 of the United Nations Charter, which deals with assistance to the Security Council upon its request and of otherwise providing for the mobilization of appropriate economic and social machinery of the United Nations and its Specialized Agencies both for assistance to the civilian population of Korea, and for bringing home to the people of the world an adequate understanding of and support for United Nations action regarding Korea. After much preliminary discussion at informal private meetings in Geneva, and after such consultation elsewhere, an appropriate resolution was passed by the Security Council on July 31, the last day before the return of the veto-wielding Soviet Representative to that Council; and the Economic and Social Council passed a carefully prepared resolution regarding Korea on August 14.

2. An important feature of the 11th Session of the Council was the fact that fundamental differences of opinion and interests between various democratic countries particularly revolving around such basic structural problems as the dollar gap were brought prominently into open debate. This development was facilitated by the absence of the representatives of the Soviet Union and the two satellite members of the Council who had boycotted the Session. Hardly any time, therefore, was spent on cold war propaganda charges and counter-charges. Indeed, with the exception of less than an hour spent in Plenary Session on Korea and perhaps two hours on Item 22 (Forced Labour), it would not be an exaggeration to say that cold war propaganda was virtually entirely absent from this Session. The Council was, therefore, a much more workmanlike body than it had been in previous years.

3. The debate which obtained most attention at this session of the Council was that on Item 3 (Full Employment). In 1949 the temporary recession in the United States caused a substantial curtailment in the exports of European countries to the United States market, and was an important factor leading to the devaluation of European currencies in September of that year. It was in that atmosphere of concern that the Council at its 9th Session in the summer of 1949, passed a resolution calling for a study, by independent experts, of national and international measures to achieve and maintain full employment. The Experts' Report was made available just before the session in January 1950 of the Economic and Employment Commission. The Commission considered the report and concluded that because of the wide implications of its bold and far-reaching recommendations, it should be given thorough and detailed study by Governments. The Economic and Social Council at its 10th Session in February-March 1950, agreed with the findings of its Economic and Employment Commission, and while giving preliminary consideration to the report, decided that Council action on the report should be deferred until the 11th Session, to give Member Governments sufficient time to study the report, and submit their comments and suggestions to the Secretary-General.

4. At this Session of the Council, Item 3 on Full Employment, and Item 6 on Financing of Economic Development were dealt with jointly through each stage of deliberations by the Council, its Economic Committee and "working" Sub-Committee. These two items formed the major part of the work of the Session in the economic field and the meetings of the Economic Committee were almost completely devoted to these subjects. Before the end of the Session, resolutions were hammered out which may prove of value in focussing attention on practicable lines of progress towards a solution of the problem of structural disequilibrium and the dollar gap and a minimising of the disturbing repercussions of fluctuations in international trade.

5. An important and very encouraging feature of the Council debates at this Session on the major economic items which are of obvious vital interest both to European nations and under-developed countries, was the high degree of responsibility, moderation and willingness to adjust shown on all sides. On this occasion, at least, the absence of the Soviet bloc and the examination of serious problems which could divide the democratic countries, led not to head-on collision and disunity, but to mutual accommodation and restraint which, if maintained, holds important promise for the future.

6. On the economic side, the Council gave a number of new tasks to the Economic Section of the Secretariat, and to the Economic and Employment Commission (in future to be known as the Economic, Employment and Development Commission), which will involve a substantial increase in United Nations machinery and responsibilities in the trade and balance of payments fields. The Canadian Delegation was particularly concerned, and on the whole successful, in an attempt to moderate the very extreme proposals in this field put forward by the United States and the United Kingdom, to avoid unnecessary duplication of the research machinery and functions of OEEC and other bodies, and in general to restrain what seemed to the Delegation an unrealistically over-ambitious rate of progress.

7. The mature and responsible attitude consistently shown by most of the delegations of under-developed countries with respect to the complex and important economic problems considered at this Session was unfortunately not always shown to an equal degree by those members of the same delegations who dealt with some of the social questions. An outstanding example of irresponsibility was the position taken by several delegations on the item dealing with long-range activities for children. The thinking of the under-developed countries on this proposed scheme was simple, clear and short-sighted: they were to be the beneficiaries of the Fund and they wanted as much as they could get from it. They, therefore, insisted upon an impossibly ambitious programme which made sense only if enormous sums of money were to be made available. Yet the views of the Governments which had been substantial contributors to UNICEF (with the exception of the U.S.) were given [no] weight whatever by the potential recipients who seemed quite content to secure a majority vote against the wishes of a minority who alone could ensure the financing of a programme of assistance to children.

8. (As it developed, the ECOSOC resolution on aid to children was not considered by the General Assembly, which instead decided to continue UNICEF for a further three-year period).

9. One of the important functions given by the United Nations Charter to the Economic and Social Council is the co-ordination of the Specialized Agencies which operate on a functional basis throughout most of the non-Soviet parts of the world. The corresponding function for co-ordinating and supervising the three regional economic commissions thus far established, may become of great importance during the next few sessions. This may be of particular interest to Canada, in view of the current tendency toward a regional and inter-regional approach to certain important problems of international trade. This regional approach, particularly in the main primary commodities, could, if not watched, jeopardize the broader multilateral approach with which Canadian commercial interests have been so closely bound up. It is, of course, obvious that so long as a large dollar gap and consequent inconvertibility of most currencies remain, regional and inter-regional approaches which exclude hard currency areas are likely to be, at least to some extent, inevitable.

10. Regarding the co-ordination of Specialized Agencies, the Council has for some years played a part in co-ordination of functions. The co-ordination of policies of Specialized Agencies, which the Charter also foresees, gives rise to much more far-reaching difficulties. Membership in the United Nations is not coterminous with that of the Specialized Agencies. So long as the Soviet Union and its satellites are members of the United Nations with representation on ECOSOC, and are not members of most Specialized Agencies, the anomaly could become important. It would scarcely be tolerable if, for example, the Soviet bloc tried through the Council to influence in any important aspects the policy of broad international functional organizations in which they would not participate. It is partly for these reasons that the Council has hitherto gone very slowly in this matter. However, at its 11th Session the Council, its task made easier in this regard by the absence of Communist representatives, did make a number of general recommendations, particularly regarding criteria for international projects, which may in time prove the beginning of an important development towards rationalization.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR EAST

On December 8, 1949, the General Assembly of the United Nations approved the raising of a fund of $54,900,000 to finance the Agency mentioned above. This sum is to be raised through voluntary contributions from governments. Contributions are being requested for the eighteen-month period (January 1, 1950 - June 30, 1951) for which the Agency will operate.

2. General Kennedy,[79] the newly appointed Director of this Agency, has urgently requested "an early and generous contribution by the Canadian Government", for the funds of the Agency are now near exhaustion and the borrowing capacity of the Agency has reached its limits.

3. The refugee problem remains one of the most serious obstacles to peace and stability in the Near East. Some 940,000 displaced Arabs are unable to return to their homes in territory now controlled by Israel. The great majority are destitute. They constitute a heavy drain on the economic resources of the Arab States which, themselves, are in grave financial difficulties and cannot deal with the problem unaided. Israel, committed to receiving and absorbing a steady flow of Jewish immigrants, feels that it cannot, at this time take back large numbers of former Arab residents. While this problem continues the number of people who are susceptible to Soviet propaganda increases, both among the displaced Arabs and in the communities which shelter them. Reports from the Middle East reflect the growing influence of communist organizers among these displaced persons and in the communities disrupted by their arrival.

[79] Le major-général Howard Kennedy (Canada), directeur de l'Office de secours et de travaux des Nations Unies pour les réfugiés de Palestine dans le Proche-Orient.
Major-General Howard Kennedy (Canada), Director of United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.

4. The Middle East occupies a pivotal position in the strategic planning of both the Soviet Union and the Western powers. It is an area where international rivalry is acute and where the Soviet Union will use any psychological advantage to undermine the influence and the strength of the West. For these reasons, therefore, it is suggested that Canadian support be given to constructive international action which should enable the refugees to improve their lot by their own efforts.

5. To continue handling the refugee problem as it has been in the past (by providing direct relief alone) would perpetuate a dangerous situation.

6. The programme approved by the Assembly is intended to break the back of the refugee problem by providing paid employment for refugees in place of direct relief. The equivalent of approximately $33,700,000 will be required for both relief and works programmes for the period January 1 to December 31, 1950. From January 1, 1951 to June 30, 1951 the remainder, approximately $21,200,000 will be applied to works projects alone.

7. During the first period, it is expected that the majority of the refugees will gradually cease to draw direct relief and will be put to work. The cost of relief will be reduced and the Near Eastern countries may be able, without further United Nations assistance, to assume the remaining burden of direct relief by January 1, 1951.

8. At the same time, the works programme will add to the productive capacity of the countries where the refugees are located. In the process, some of the refugees will no doubt be absorbed permanently in their present environment. The programme therefore offers a means of reducing the number of refugees to a point where the problem can be solved through repatriation to Israel and permanent resettlement in the Arab countries.

9. Since August 1948, Canada has contributed supplies valued at $1,040,616 for the relief of refugees from the Palestine area. The United States has contributed $13,377,930.

10. On January 30, 1950, the President of the United States sent a message to Congress proposing that the United States contribute half of the required amount of $54,900,000 ($27,450,000). This sum has been authorized by both Houses of Congress and it is expected that it will be approved in the appropriations stage.

11. It is expected that the United Kingdom will contribute the equivalent of $9,000,000 although this sum will include an interest-free loan of one million pounds which has been made to the Hashemite Kingdom of the Jordan. France and the Arab States are expected to contribute the equivalents of $4,000,000 and $6,000,000 respectively.

12. There are many countries with closer and more immediate interests in the Middle East than Canada. Therefore Canada cannot be expected to contribute as much, even on a proportionate basis, as those countries. On the other hand, in view of Canada's general interest in the area, it is desirable to make a fair sized contribution. This is the more desirable if that contribution is spent on Canadian commodities that are readily available.

13. The following Canadian commodities are needed at once by the Relief and Works Agency: flour, butter (or margarine), handtools, pumps, steel piping and lumber. Most of these commodities are readily available in Canada and could be supplied to the Agency, so that the Canadian contribution could be spent in this country.

14. In the light of these consideration, it is recommended that:

(a) an initial contribution in Canadian dollars of $750,000 be authorized for the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East;

(b) that the Director of the Relief and Works Agency be requested to consult with the appropriate Canadian authorities about the use of this sum and, for this purpose, to draw up a programme of purchases in Canada;

(c) that the Director of the Agency be informed that if the initial sum of $750,000 has been fully used up or earmarked for programmed purchases in Canada by December 31, 1950, and if he requires more funds, the Canadian Government would give sympathetic consideration to a request for a further sum of $750,000;

(d) that none of the moneys approved under (a) and (c) above be transferred into foreign currencies without the specific approval of the proper Canadian authorities.[80]

TELEGRAM 595 Ottawa, November 4, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UNRWPR

Following for Riddell from Holmes, Begins: On September 12 General Kennedy wrote to Mr. Heeney from Beirut asking that the unspent portion of the Canadian contribution be made available to his Agency "in cash fully convertible into Near East currencies". We have been discussing this request with the Department of Finance and with General Kennedy when he was in Ottawa. There is unfortunately some ambiguity in the Cabinet instruction of last June on this subject as to whether the Agency was bound to spend all the Canadian contribution in purchasing Canadian supplies. Whereas we in this Department have argued that the Agency ought to try to place at least one more substantial order in Canada before asking for the conversion of the rest, the Department of Finance have tended to insist on full expenditure in Canada. They have been doubtful as to whether the Agency has tried seriously to make purchases in Canada. Our view on this matter is conditioned by a belief that the Agency has tried to buy what it could in this country, and also from a recognition of the strength of Kennedy's argument that supplies purchased in Canada are useful only for the relief programme, whereas cash contributions assist in the works programme which the Agency was instructed to emphasize and which is designed to liquidate rather than perpetuate the problem.

2. When Kennedy was in Ottawa he spoke to Dr. Clark and did I think succeed in convincing him that the Agency had done better than Clark had thought. Deutsch has indicated to me that Finance would probably agree to the conversion of some of our contribution into cash provided they could have more specific information. Deutsch thinks the Agency should provide a good deal more information on the following subjects:

(1) The exact amounts of cash in specific currencies which they need.

(2) Information as to the nature of contributions from other Governments and in particular the extent to which other Governments have provided convertible cash rather than contributions in kind.

3. Deutsch also wanted more information about the accomplishments of the Agency. This, I think, is now supplied by the Agency's report which has recently reached us. Would it be possible for you to ask either Kennedy or his liaison officers at Lake Success to provide us with the above and any additional information which would be helpful in persuading Finance. You might bear in mind the view expressed by Deutsch that the U.N. Agencies have a tendency to ask Canada to help them out and that we are imposed upon much more than other countries.

Dear Sir,

I wish to refer to your memoranda dated October 24th† and November 4th,† concerning the request by General Kennedy, Director of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees, that a portion of the Canadian contribution be made available to the Agency in cash.

It was helpful, in reviewing this question, to have a copy of the report of the Director of the Agency. The relatively little real progress made in reducing direct relief through employment projects, leading toward a permanent solution of the problem, and the inadequacy of contributions by many other countries are two very disturbing aspects revealed by the report.

I have had an opportunity to have a brief chat with General Kennedy concerning the question under discussion. Despite some ambiguity in the recommendations to Cabinet regarding the form of this contribution, it was, I think, certainly considered at the time it was discussed in Cabinet that an Agency spending approximately $20 million a year for direct relief should not have any difficulty in utilising $750,000 in Canada. It seems incredible that such should be the case. General Kennedy has stressed, however, the urgent need of the Agency for cash next month in order to meet wage payments on works projects. This aspect of the Agency's work certainly warrants our particular encouragement and support, although it does not necessarily follow that in doing so a contribution in cash is required. However, under the circumstances in which the Agency is in urgent need of cash, I am prepared to agree to a contribution in cash before December 31st, 1950, not to exceed $200,000 (Canadian). In doing so, General Kennedy should, I feel, be advised that this payment should in no way be considered a precedent in respect of future contributions by Canada to the Agency. It is essential, I think, that any considerations regarding the form, and possibly the magnitude of our further contributions, should be made in the light of the progress achieved in reaching a real solution to this refugee problem, the extent to which this problem now being discussed in the United Nations is approached realistically by the United Nations and those countries more directly concerned, and our overall policy as it is developed in respect of contributions to other causes of a similar nature.

General Kennedy might, I think, be advised that this cash payment will be made. I should like, however, to consider further the method of payment and will advise you shortly on this.

Yours very truly,
W.C. CLARK

Le sous-ministre adjoint des Finances
au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, November 21, 1950

Dear Sir:

1. I have received your letter of November 2nd† asking for my views on the Palestine refugee problem.

2. In addition to your commentary for the guidance of the delegation to the United Nations Assembly, which was attached to your letter, I have read the Interim Report of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees and teletypes No. 272† and 273† which you referred to. However, I regret that I have not been able to get a copy of the Supplementary Report of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine, which you regard as a basic document.

3. Frankly, the Palestine problem is disturbing. The Agency's report discloses several points which suggest that disposing of this problem is going to be a slow and costly business. The hopes created by the Economic Survey Mission's report are not being fulfilled.

4. To me, the most disturbing features of the Agency's report are:

(a) The transfer of refugees from direct relief to works projects — the core of the Agency's program — is behind the schedule provided by the Economic Survey Mission. Five months after the Agency began operations only 17,500 of some 900,000 refugees were at work. Moreover, of this number several hundred were doing administrative and professional jobs which existed before the Agency came into being.

(b) Because of the local wage structure, the Agency has been unable to devise a formula which would permit it to pay wages to those refugees who are employed and to strike them off the ration rolls. In other words, until this aspect of the problem is solved, the Agency will not be able to decrease its relief functions as it increases the works projects.

(c) The few works projects that the Agency has undertaken are short-term projects and will not add materially to the productive capacity of the countries concerned, and thereby facilitate the permanent absorption of the refugees into their present environment.

(d) The Agency has apparently been handicapped by the lack of co-operation on the part of the refugees, the local communities and most of the governments concerned. Although the Agency's report is moderately optimistic about receiving the co-operation of the Middle East governments in the future, the almost pathological attitude of many of them to the Palestine problem suggests that any co-operation forthcoming will be limited and conditional, and liable to be withdrawn at any moment.

(e) The reluctance of most countries to contribute funds to the Agency. Of the $54,900,000 requested, only $40 million has been promised. Of this sum, only $27 million had been given to the Agency by the middle of October. Moreover, the $27 million was provided by three countries — the U.K., the U.S. and Canada. The result is that the Agency has recommended that the U.N. ask "interested governments" to provide an additional $5 million to provide relief to June 30th, 1951.

(f) The Agency's request for more time and money. It suggests that the United Nations extend its mandate from June 1951 to June 1952, and provide it with an additional $50 million.

(g) The Agency's statement that this additional time and money will not solve the problem. It believes that rehabilitation of all the refugees would require a major economic effort involving private and public investment, closely related to an arrangement for general economic development.

5. As you know, Canada has made substantial contributions for the maintenance of the Palestine refugees. Since the first request for assistance in 1948, Canada has contributed or promised to contribute $2,540,616, while the U.S. has given or promised to give $40,827,930. Thus, in terms of percent of the national income, Canada has contributed as much as the U.S. If the scale of contributions is maintained, and if the refugee problem is pursued to a solution, Canada will probably be saddled with a substantial financial burden for several years.

6. Perhaps, at this point, it is apropos to mention Canada's interest in the Middle East. While I recognize the strategic position of the Middle East, and that it would be a severe blow for the West if the area fell to the Communists, I suggest that many countries, particularly the U.S., U.K. and possibly France, have deeper and more remunerative interests there than Canada.[81] This point will make it difficult to justify future contributions which, on a national income basis, equal those of the U.S. or the U.K.

7. Another point that should be mentioned is that the Palestine refugees must now compete with Korean refugees, International refugees, etc., for assistance. It appears to me that the aid to the Palestine refugees is only one aspect of the larger problem of international assistance which embraces the International Refugee Organization, International Children's Emergency Fund, United Nations and Commonwealth Technical Assistance, and Korean Relief and Reconstruction. The combined demand will undoubtedly exceed the supply, and therefore, it might be necessary to establish a system of priorities.

8. It appears to me that in the final analysis the Palestine refugees are the product of conflicting political forces. If these forces are not reconciled, repatriation of some refugees to Israel and the resettlement of others in the Arab countries — apparently essential parts of any solution — will be impossible. Moreover, failure to reconcile the political factors can only result in the Agency being frustrated by the opposition of the peoples and governments concerned and the dissipation of its funds on relief. However, I realize that it might be Utopian to expect much in the way of a political settlement at this time.

Yours very truly,
R.B. BRYCE

FURTHER CANADIAN CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR-EAST

1. The Ad Hoc Political Committee of the General Assembly has recently approved the recommendation of the Director of the Agency mentioned above for the continuation of its mandate beyond the original termination date of June 30, 1951, until June 30, 1952. The Committee also approved the raising of a fund of $50,000,000 through international subscription for the period July 1, 1951, to June 30, 1952. Of this sum, $20,000,000 would be used for purposes of direct relief, while $30,000,000 would finance a Reintegration Fund to begin the permanent resettlement of refugees in the Arab countries and in Israel, should a number of refugees eventually return there.

2. The programme originally approved by the Assembly was designed in part as an emergency relief measure, and in part to provide paid employment for the refugees as a first step towards eventual rehabilitation and resettlement. However, the Arab governments adopted the attitude that co-operation with the Agency would prejudice the rights of the refugees under Resolution No. 194 (III) of December 11, 1948, which favoured their return to Israel. The Arab refugees have also refused to countenance any other solution but the return to their former homes. As a result, the Agency was frustrated in its major purpose of providing work for the refugees on public works' projects in the countries where the refugees now find themselves.

3. The Canadian approach on this problem is predicated on the desire to bring into being a realistic programme for the final resettlement of the Arab refugees. The Canadian Delegate on the Ad Hoc Political Committee has indicated that Canadian support for the establishment of the $30,000,000 Reintegration Fund may depend on the degree to which this fund will be associated with practical plans for a permanent solution of the refugee problem through resettlement in the Arab countries and by repatriation to Israel. Canadian reluctance to become committed to a contribution was intended as a form of pressure to induce the Arab governments to adopt a more realistic attitude by accepting the recommendations of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine. The Interim Report of this Conciliation Commission, which has not yet come up for discussion, urges the adoption of measures by the Arab states for assuring the full reintegration of refugees, who may not be able to return to their former homes in Israel, and the provision of all necessary facilities for resettlement by the governments concerned. Nevertheless a Negotiating-Sub-committee has been set up in the meantime and may approach the Canadian Delegation for an indication on a Canadian contribution before the Conciliation Commission's recommendations are taken up.[82]

4. The need for international funds to provide relief remains acute and demanding. Over 800,000 Arab refugees will require to be fed and clothed while waiting for a political solution which will lead to their integration into constructive life.

5. On June 12, 1950, Cabinet decided to make an initial contribution of $750,000 to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near-East. Cabinet also specified "that the Director of the Agency be informed that if the initial sum of $750,000 has been fully used up or earmarked for programmed purchases in Canada by December 31, 1950, and if he requires more funds, the Canadian Government would give sympathetic consideration to a request for a further sum of $750,000". Arrangements for the final allocation of the initial contribution are now being discussed with the Director of the Agency, and it is expected that he will make a request for a further contribution of $750,000 for the period of January 1, 1951, to June 30, 1951.

Contribution for the Period of January 1, 1951 to June 30, 1951

6. It is recommended that authorization be given for the contribution of $750,000 in Canadian dollars to the Agency for purchases in Canada, although a reasonable portion might be contributed in cash readily convertible into Middle East currencies at the joint discretion of the Ministers of Finance and External Affairs.

Contribution for the Period of July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952

7. The General Assembly will in all probability approve the Ad Hoc Political Committee's recommendation for a fund of $50,000,000 to finance the Agency's programme for this period. Of this sum, $20,000,000 will be used for relief purposes, and $30,000,000 will form a Reintegration Fund for the resettlement of Arab refugees. (These two sums relate to each other in the ratio of 3:2).

8. An equitable Canadian contribution might be related to Canada's share in the regular United Nations budget, which is 3.2%. Although this percentage would indicate a contribution of $1,600,000, it is recommended, in view of the increasing commitments for similar purposes in other parts of the world, that the over-all Canadian contribution for this period be reduced to $1,300,000.

9. It is further recommended that this contribution be divided into two parts. Since $20,000,000 of the total fund will be used for relief purposes, it is recommended that $520,000 (Canadian) be made available to the Agency for purchases in Canada, although a reasonable portion might be contributed in cash readily convertible into Middle East currencies at the joint discretion of the Ministers of Finance and External Affairs. The remainder ($780,000 Canadian) would be made available to the Reintegration Fund of the Agency, provided that it is evident this Fund will be used as part of a general programme for the permanent resettlement of Palestine refugees.

FURTHER CONTRIBUTIONS TO U.N. FOR ARAB REFUGEES

You invite my comments and suggestions on your draft memorandum to Cabinet.

2. I think the time has come to say: No.

3. I agree that Canada should give a second $750,000. Rightly, I think, we are half committed to it and I believe we were wise, last June, to give the new Director of the Agency an indication of the total he might expect from Canada. The total amount was reasonable in all the circumstances.

4. Beyond that amount I doubt we should provide another dollar (unless Cabinet feels that they cannot let General Kennedy down with too much of a bump in which case a third and final contribution of $750,000 might be considered).

5. I believe that Canada must develop a sensible and defensible programme of contributions for relief and reconstruction in other parts of the World. We should give willingly and generously in directions where Canada has interests and responsibilities; we should conserve our limited resources for these purposes; we should, as far as possible, refuse to give to other objectives.

6. Both you and I have given some preliminary thought to this matter, and I am working on it now. Others, in other departments are also at work. However, neither the programme nor its implications have yet been worked out.

7. Whatever the programme turns out to be, I cannot believe that Arab Refugees will be near the top of the list. I feel that, after a second $750,000, we shall have done all that can reasonably be expected, and probably more than we would have done had we been "programming" our external aid over the past year.

8. Cabinet has just approved a large contribution to Korean relief; this was, I think, desirable — although, being of an emergency and quite unpredictable nature, I am not sure that it would appear on any regular "programme". The next financial contribution that should be pressed in Cabinet — and pressed very hard — is, I believe, the Colombo Plan. It is not only a most desirable object in itself but, in a sense, we are pretty far committed. Canada has both interests and, in a measure, responsibilities in that direction.

9. If our Minister uses up his ammunition fighting for such causes as Arab Refugees he may not have enough ammunition when he really needs it. I think he should be advised to tell Cabinet of the greatly increased requests for the Arabs and then go on to say that, because of increasing demands from other directions on Canada, he is not making any recommendation beyond the second $750,000 to which Cabinet has already promised "sympathetic consideration".

ASSISTANCE TO PALESTINE REFUGEES

I have only a few suggestions to offer for the revision of the second draft of the proposed memorandum to Cabinet on this subject.

2. It seems to me that the emphasis, in paragraph 2 of the present draft, might be changed to make it conform with the reports we have received from the Conciliation Commission and the Director of the Relief and Works Agency. What I have in mind is something along the following lines:

"2. The combined relief and works programme approved by the Assembly a year ago was seriously handicapped by reason of the fact that it had no working capital and that the amount and timing of purely voluntary contributions could not be foreseen, so that planning was often reduced to a weekly basis. Having at its disposal for the works programme only 29% of what the Assembly had recommended for this purpose, the Agency was nevertheless able to remove 72,000 refugees from the relief rolls. At the same rate of progress almost one quarter million refugees might have been absorbed by the works programme had the fund established by the Assembly been fully subscribed. The Director of the Agency has insisted on the need for firm financing for 1951-52. A Negotiating Sub-committee has therefore been set up to ascertain definitely from all members of the United Nations what they will contribute for 1951-52 and at what dates their contributions will be made.

"3. Within a few days a Committee of the United Nations General Assembly is to deal with a second difficulty encountered by the Relief and Works Agency. This has been the impossibility of moving large numbers of Arab refugees from the unproductive areas where three quarters of them are now concentrated to better localities in the Arab lands so long as the Assembly does nothing to modify the position it took in December 1948 that all refugees desiring to return home and live at peace with their neighbours should be repatriated to Israel. The governments of Arab states realize that the refugee problem cannot be fully solved on the basis of repatriation alone, according to the report of the Palestine Conciliation Commission, and three of them would be in a position to cooperate in resettlement programmes if the Assembly were to abandon formally the position it has taken on repatriation. The Conciliation Commission has recommended therefore that reintegration of refugees should proceed along the lines of resettlement in Arab lands as well as repatriation to Israel.

"4. Canada is supporting this recommendation. As a means of exerting pressure to secure its acceptance by the Assembly the Canadian Delegation has indicated that Canadian support for the establishment of the $30,000,000 reintegration fund may depend on the degree to which the fund is associated with practical plans for a permanent solution of the refugee problem through repatriation and re-settlement. Meanwhile it is recognized that the need for international funds for direct relief continues to be acute. Some 800,000 refugees will require to be fed, clothed and sheltered while waiting for the political solution which will lead to their reintegration into the life of the Middle East."

3. A few minor suggestions for the revision of paragraphs 1 and 8 have been made on the copy of the memorandum you were kind enough to let us see.

FURTHER CANADIAN CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR EAST

I refer to my memorandum of November 25 on this subject, and now attach a third draft of the Memorandum to the Cabinet,† which has been revised in the light of suggestions made by European Division.

2. You will have seen Mr. Plumptre's memorandum of November 27 in which he claims the time has come to say "no" to any further contributions for the relief and works projects for Palestine refugees. I can understand Mr. Plumptre's feeling that we must establish priorities in the matter of contributions for economic assistance but this, I think, must be for the future. In other words, we must start thinking now about future projects and govern our activities in the United Nations, North Atlantic Treaty Council, Commonwealth bodies, OEEC and elsewhere according to a strict programme of priorities which would take into consideration the points mentioned in Mr. Plumptre's memorandum.

[83] Notes marginales:/Marginal notes:
Mr. Heeney, The draft memorandum to Cabinet seems to me to be satisfactory but my understanding is that the Minister does not want this put up until Mr Plumptre's paper is ready. E. R[eid], Nov 30/50.
Mr Reid, You are right — this is to be held for general paper. A.D.P. H[eeney], Dec 3.

3. In my opinion, however, we cannot abandon a programme sponsored by the United Nations and officially approved by Canada at the very moment when all members of the United Nations are being approached with a request that they should do their fair share to make the programme succeed. Canada worked and voted in 1947 for the partition of Palestine and is very anxious that this policy should have the effect of benefitting both Jews and Arabs. One half of the objective we had in view in 1947 has been accomplished. We are now confronted with an opportunity to help finish the work we began at that time. It is unthinkable that we should turn our back on an effort which United Nations representatives on the spot have told us is necessary in order to rectify the dislocations caused by the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. These very dislocations provide us with an opportunity to inaugurate development schemes in the Arab lands for resettlement of Arab refugees which will have a beneficial effect on the life of the region as a whole and make for permanent stability in an area where disorder can only benefit our enemies.

4. I question the statement in Mr. Plumptre's paragraph 5 that we should give in directions where Canada has interests and responsibilities, and as far as possible, refuse to give to other objectives. Does this mean that we are going to refuse to contribute to any United Nations programme because we fail to see any possibility of an immediate return for our money? Then we had better stop contributing to UNICEF, WHO, UNESCO, and so on. Furthermore, I wonder if our interests really are greater in South-East Asia than in the Near East. This area will be of vital importance to the West in the event of war, and from the political point of view I should think we must do all we can to prevent conditions growing up, which would make the inhabitants hostile to the West and a breeding-ground for Communism.

5. You will also have seen the letter of November 21 on this subject from the Deputy Minister of Finance. I am wondering if it is really the role of the Department of Finance to examine, in the way they have, the political aspects of the Palestine problem, and to question the political basis of the decision of this Department that Canada should make some further contribution to the United Nations programme. Surely we should not have to justify to the Department of Finance decisions on political questions which have been reached by this Department only after a great deal of thought has been devoted to them. This is, of course, a problem on which I am not competent to judge, but I thought I should draw it to your attention as it is nicely pointed up by Mr. Bryce's letter.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTIONS FOR ARAB REFUGEES

A day or two ago a third draft of a memorandum to Cabinet, dated November 27,† came onto my desk. I am not sure whether I was expected to send further comments, and in any case it may now be too late. However, here are a couple of observations for whatever they may be worth.

I felt that the second draft of the memorandum was perhaps a bit too tough on the Arab Governments — especially in paragraph two. On the other hand, I feel that the third draft gives the erroneous impression that the Arab Governments are all sweetness and light. Might it not be possible to leave an impression midway between these two extremes — an impression which, from my limited knowledge, seems to be about right.

I read with interest your memorandum to Mr. Reid of November 29th. I think you did a little less than justice to my own memorandum of November 27th, but perhaps that was about what it deserved! At any rate, your observations are very helpful in connection with the work I am trying to do on a Canadian programme for relief and re-construction. (I wish the world would stand still for a minute so that I could get on with it.)

I am still troubled by the proposal to give so much to Arab relief. After talking to you, and later to Mr. Reid, I realize that we are much more deeply committed than I had appreciated when I wrote my memorandum of November 27th. However, I have an uneasy feeling that the pit into which the money is being poured has not got much in the way of a bottom. Certainly, the Arab Governments have not done much to build a bottom into it. I suppose I could not persuade you to put in the memorandum to Cabinet a statement that, although these sums were being recommended for 1951 and 1952, very close scrutiny indeed would be given to the question before further contributions would be recommended to Cabinet.

RE NEWFOUNDLAND SALTED CODFISH

The Problem

1. Catching and salting codfish is the main source of livelihood for over one-third of the Newfoundland population. Annual production averages approximately 100 million pounds. Little can be done in a short time to reduce production, although plans for the eventual diversification of production are currently being worked out with the Provincial Government and the fishing industry.

2. In recent years, roughly one-half of the Newfoundland production has been marketed in the Mediterranean countries. The balance shares the Western Hemisphere markets with the mainland production of approximately 40 million pounds. For the past several years, arrangements have been made with the U.K. for sales in Europe for sterling. This arrangement was continued for the 1949 production. Despite this fact, there remains in Newfoundland some 18 million pounds unsold from the 1949 production. Closure of the important Brazilian market in 1949 was an important factor in the development of the present carry-over.

3. Faced with this carry-over and no assurances respecting the marketing of the 1950 production, Newfoundland fishermen, merchants, finance agencies and the Provincial Government are greatly concerned over the prospect.

Considerations

It appears essential that some positive action be taken now to stabilize the situation in order to avoid serious unemployment and consequent relief payments and to provide time for the working out of a full solution to the 1950 marketing problem.

Alternative immediate solutions include:

(a) Action under the Fisheries Prices Support Act to guarantee prices to fishermen for 1950.

The Fisheries Prices Support Board would strongly recommend against the idea of an advance guarantee because of the effect that such action would have in impeding the normal marketing of the product and the impossibility of confining such action to the production of the province of Newfoundland.

(b) Action by the Government to arrange for sales in sterling to European markets for 1950.

Arrangements for sales in sterling may be possible and ultimately necessary, but such an arrangement appears impossible of completion in the immediate future.

(c) Action under the Fisheries Prices Support Act to purchase a portion of the carry-over for disposal to the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund.

The Fisheries Prices Support Board would recommend against a purchase by the Board of a portion of the carry-over because:

(i) If the Board sought to buy at the lowest possible price — in the interest of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund — it would be accused of breaking rather than strengthening the market.

(ii) Since at least some of the fish to be purchased is already in the hands of merchants and exporters the Board would be establishing a precedent of giving aid to a secondary industry.

(iii) Purchase by UNICEF rather than the Board would have a beneficial rather than adverse effect on foreign buyers, regardless of the price paid.

(d) Action by the Government to make a grant to the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund for the purchase and use of a portion of the carry-over.

(i) Action along this line would be a strengthening factor in the market; it would give confidence to the Newfoundland interests without any implied guarantee for the future and would provide time for working out a more complete answer to the problem of marketing the 1950 production.

(ii) Invitations to offer to UNICEF could be sent to mainland as well as Newfoundland producers. While the mainland producers have no apparent carry-over, there would be some political advantage in this procedure.

(iii) The United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund have indicated a strong desire to secure supplies of salted codfish for feeding in Italy and Greece where the product has been used previously with full satisfaction. The agency has no funds with which to make a commercial purchase.

Recommendation

It is recommended that an appropriation be provided through supplemental estimates to the Department of External Affairs amounting to $600,000, to provide for the purchase by the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund of approximately 5 million pounds of salted codfish. Price to be determined by negotiation between UNICEF and the Newfoundland exporters.[84]

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 112-50 [Ottawa], April 11, 1950

CONTINUING NEEDS OF CHILDREN AFTER CESSATION OF UNICEF

Since the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund was established in December 1946 the Canadian Government has contributed $6,275,000. In addition, $1,350,000 has been raised in Canada for UNICEF by private subscription through the United Nations Appeal for Children. All of this money has been spent on purchases in Canada. UNICEF has also spent in Canada additional amounts to a total of $3,264,000 in United States funds.

2. It now seems likely that the work of UNICEF will shortly be brought to a close. The sum of $75,000,000 which was appropriated by the United States Congress to be paid over to UNICEF, on a matching basis of $72 for every $28 contributed by other governments, is almost exhausted; and it seems unlikely that another appropriation of anything like this scale will be approved by Congress. Under these circumstances the Secretary-General of the United Nations was requested by the Social Commission of the Economic and Social Council to prepare a report concerning the arrangements which would be advisable to carry on, within the United Nations, essential long-range activities for the welfare of children. It might appear that the best course would be to make no new formal arrangements but merely to divide among the existing specialized agencies, such as the World Health Organization and the Food and Agricultural Organization, those functions of UNICEF which it seemed desirable to continue. It is highly improbable, however, that this course will be followed in view of the strong feeling in the United States that some organization within the United Nations should continue to be specially charged with responsibility for dealing with the welfare of children. It is also felt that the existing agencies, whose responsibilities lie primarily in other fields, would tend to neglect the problems which are of concern to children specifically.

3. It is therefore virtually certain that the Social Commission (which is meeting at present in New York) and ECOSOC (which meets again in Geneva in July) will recommend the establishment of some form of organization to assume responsibility in this field. The proposals which have been made by the Secretary-General in his report of the 22nd of March seem to be the most modest solution that can be hoped for. He recommends that no attempt should be made to continue the mass-feeding programmes which have been conducted by UNICEF. Instead, he proposes that United Nations activity in this field should be chiefly in the form of technical assistance. The United Nations should aim at providing assistance to governments in the development of their own programmes for children by the organization of demonstration projects, the establishment of training centres and arrangements for fellowships in more advanced countries. To this end, he suggests that the United Nations should establish, along the lines which have been approved for the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, the following permanent co-ordinating machinery:

(a) A policy-making body composed of government representatives responsible to the Economic and Social Council.

(b) An advisory and reviewing body composed of technically competent officials of the various United Nations organs which carry on programmes in the field of child welfare, e.g., I.L.O., F.A.O., UNESCO, WHO.

(c) An administrative unit within the United Nations Secretariat, presumably in the Social Division.

4. The Secretary-General proposes that there should be a special international children's fund to which voluntary contribution would be made by governments and peoples to be allocated for use by the various United Nations bodies under the supervision of the co-ordinating machinery which has already been described. The Canadian Government would, therefore, incur no further financial obligation as a result of supporting the Secretary-General's proposals. From time to time, however, it would be invited to make voluntary contributions. If it were decided to contribute, the scale of the contributions could be substantially less than those which have been made hitherto by the Canadian Government to UNICEF.

5. It is recommended that the Canadian representative on the Social Commission of ECOSOC should be authorized to support, in principle, the Secretary-General's proposals since they seem to offer the most modest and least expensive way of dealing with this problem.[85]

UNITED NATIONS INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND

1. Discussion of UNICEF is now expected to begin on Monday and Curry should have indication by Friday at the latest of the Government's policy. The French delegation, which wants UNICEF to continue in its present form, has been pressing for a postponement of the discussion, no doubt in the hope that if the Commission has not time to consider the subject, there will be no change in the present position. Curry has taken the lead in urging that the subject be considered as soon as possible, and he will find himself in an embarrassing position if he is not able to state the Canadian policy. New Zealand is also expected to urge that UNICEF continue as at present.

2. Altemeyer,[86] of the United States delegation, has shown Curry the plan which the United States wish to put forward. It is not certain that this will finally be the State Department's proposal, but Curry expects that it will be. This United States position is a little different from the proposals now under consideration in Ottawa. It calls for a governing body composed of the Social Commission, or appointees of the Social Commission, together with representatives of the major contributing nations which are not members of the United Nations. This plan, however, would not bring specialized agencies into closely knit Committee comparable with the TAB, but would give them only a consultative capacity. Curry still thinks the Canadian tentative proposals better than the American plan. He is anxious to know, however, how firmly he should stand by them in the face of opposition.

My dear John [Holmes]:

I am enclosing with this letter a Memorandum to Cabinet on the "Continuing Needs of Children after the Cessation of UNICEF" for you to show to Mr. Curry. This Memorandum has been approved by Mr. Pearson and will be submitted by him to Cabinet early next week. I regret that it will not be possible to secure a Cabinet decision on this question for Mr. Curry's guidance before it is raised in the Social Commission. You will be aware, however, that Parliament has risen for the Easter Recess and that the Prime Minister is out of Ottawa.

Although it would be preferable if Mr. Curry could enter the fray with the backing of a firm decision by the Government here I hope that he will feel that we have done all we could under the circumstances to assist him. It would, of course, be improper for us to issue him with instructions; and I believe that, in fact, in the past our representative on the Social Commission has never received any prior indication of the Canadian Government's views on the subjects which were under discussion. The attached document will at least acquaint Mr. Curry with the considered view of the Department of External Affairs on this question.

CONTINUING NEEDS OF CHILDREN AFTER CESSATION OF UNICEF

Your memorandum to Cabinet on the above subject has, I understand, not yet been discussed on the agenda and I am therefore providing the following information to bring the matter up to date.

2. On April 22, 1950, the Social Commission completed its consideration on this item and adopted a resolution by a vote of 10-3-3 recommending that the Economic and Social Council "take all necessary steps to ensure the uninterrupted continuation and development of the activities of the International Children's Emergency Fund". The United States, the United Kingdom and Canada voted against the resolution; Denmark, Australia and South Africa abstained. However, the resolution recognized that UNICEF "should progressively and with due regard to all needs and its own resources shift emphasis from immediate to long term objectives", i.e. from the provision of relief supplies to provision of "assistance to governments designed to aid them in creating or expanding their permanent child welfare programmes".

3. Mr. Curry opposed the resolution, I understand, largely because it would set up a Children's Board composed of governments represented on the Social Commission together with certain additions instead of a completely separate Board elected directly by ECOSOC. Furthermore, the Social Commission resolution provides for the "close collaboration of the Fund with the specialized agencies" instead of the integration of the specialized agencies by representation on a non-governmental Executive Body.

4. Dr. Davidson feels that the proposals contained in the memorandum for Cabinet would still be desirable as directives for our delegations to ECOSOC and the General Assembly. However, if the Taft Bill at present before the United States Congress, which provides for the grant of additional funds to UNICEF, should become law, he feels that there is little point in seeking to scale down the feeding programme of UNICEF at the present time.

5. I am not convinced that the present resolution may not be acceptable to the Canadian Government subject to any changes in the organization which our representatives may be able to obtain at ECOSOC and the General Assembly. It would mean that for the next two or three years there would be a continuation of fairly large scale feeding programmes so that the Canadian contribution could, as in the past, be largely in kind. In subsequent years the emphasis could be directed more and more toward the long-term child welfare programmes as envisaged in your memorandum to Cabinet.

Following for Pearson from Fournier, Begins: We understand that Security Council yesterday considered a resolution which inter alia will request ECOSOC to call upon specialized agencies, specifically including UNICEF, to carry out relief activities in Korea. If Security Council approved this resolution we assume you will not, repeat not, want us to urge dissolution of UNICEF and cessation of its relief programme. Incidentally this line is in any event doomed to overwhelming defeat since United States and French delegations have agreed on a resolution similar to that proposed by Social Commission. In the light of Korean situation we think that the best solution would be to postpone any change in the terms of reference of UNICEF and to favour its continuation on present lines for at least another year. Failing agreement on this we would think it desirable for Canadian delegation to support some resolution which would permit of continuation of relief activities on behalf of children having in mind possible implications for Korean situation.

2. Item 26 comes before Social Committee on Thursday morning, August 3rd, and unless we receive instructions in the meantime we shall pursue one or other of courses mentioned in preceding paragraph. Ends.

Following for Fournier from Pearson, Begins: Your telegram No. 127 of August 1, 1950. Continuing needs of children.

2. Resolution referred to in your telegram was passed by Security Council on Monday.

3. I agree with your suggestion that the delegation urge postponement of any change in the terms of reference of UNICEF. The entire question of our attitude toward international relief agencies must be reviewed in the light of recent developments in Korea and elsewhere.

4. If you cannot obtain support for continuance of UNICEF, I leave it to your discretion to support or abstain from voting on the United States-France resolution. The Department of Finance is disturbed about building into the United Nations a new type of machinery without looking at the problem as a whole. Furthermore, the General Assembly will have difficulty in determining the amount of the administrative budget required to implement a work program dependent upon voluntary contributions. In any event I think you should express a warning that the Canadian delegation has doubts with respect to these aspects of the proposed resolution, although it will not vote against the resolution because it supports the continuance of some form of organization operating in this field, at least for the next year or two. DESPATCH 59 New York, October 12, 1950

ACTIVITIES OF SOCIAL COMMITTEE — LONG-RANGE ACTIVITIES FOR CHILDREN

Attached for your information is a United Nations Press Release dated October 9, 1950†, which reproduces the statement made in the Third Committee by Mrs. D.B. Sinclair on the above-mentioned question.

2. Some twenty countries have up to now participated in the debate on this third item of the Agenda of the Third Committee. The U.S. delegate, who was among the first speakers, reiterated in a very precise statement the position which the U.S. delegation advocated at Geneva during the 11th Session of the Council. In explaining to the Committee the various amendments which the U.S. delegation was hoping would be made to the ECOSOC resolution under consideration, Mrs. Roosevelt[87] made it quite clear that in the event that such amendments as proposed by the U.S. delegation were not accepted, it would prove very difficult, if not impossible, to secure the necessary congressional approval for the U.S. contribution to the Fund.

3. The strongest rebuttal made in reply to the United States Statement came from the Delegate of Pakistan Professor Bokhari; I think that the reaction of most of the responsible delegates in the Third Committee to Professor Bokhari's speech was that it was to a considerable extent unrealistic and that its bitterness might be damaging to the future operations of the Fund, by antagonizing the U.S. Government and thus by bringing about a substantial cut in the U.S. contribution. The tone of the debate, as set by the Pakistan Delegate, did not fortunately continue in the course of the meetings held this week. In general the opposition to the U.S. proposals came from two groups of countries: those which did not want the Organization to be made permanent and among these are the U.K. and Australia; and those made up of the under-developed countries which fear that the U.S. emphasis on a Technical Assistance approach might deprive them of supplies.

4. When a number of amendments which were being submitted made it evident that great difficulties were to be encountered in reaching a satisfactory formula concerning the future of the Fund, the Australian Delegation presented a draft resolution which would actually provide for a continuation of the Fund for a two-year period on exactly the same terms of reference on which it has been operating, but for a revision of the Board's membership. I am enclosing for your information the text of the various amendments submitted so far, as well as the text of the Australian draft resolution.

[87] Eleanor Roosevelt, représentante des États-Unis auprès des Nations Unies; présidente de la Commission des droits de l'homme.
Eleanor Roosevelt, Representative of United States to United Nations; Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights.

5. The Third Committee adjourned yesterday afternoon in order to allow the sub-committee created for the purpose of examining the various amendments submitted, to meet and take action in accordance with its terms of reference; this sub-committee has been charged with "clarifying to the greatest possible extent the different points of view expressed in the amendments submitted, to reduce these amendments to the smallest number necessary to express the differences still outstanding and to report to the Committee as quickly as possible". It may be said that the Canadian Delegation had originally thought of proposing the setting up of such a sub-committee; when the representative of Ecuador did so, before our Delegation made its statement, the Canadian Delegation associated itself with the Ecuadorian proposal.

6. It is understood that the sub-committee which met yesterday following the adjournment of the Third Committee, and again this afternoon has not been very successful in bringing about a compromise among the various delegations which have submitted amendments. If no such compromise is available by tomorrow, it is expected that a separate vote will have to be taken in the Committee on each of the various amendments as well as on the Australian draft resolution.

7. If the Australian Delegation succeeds in having its proposal voted on first, there is a chance that it may carry. In view of the difficulty which the U.S. Delegation will have in securing money from Congress, unless the terms of reference provide for a Technical Assistance approach, as well as for emergency cases, we feel that it is consistent with our position at the Eleventh Session of ECOSOC to support the United States. In the event that they should support the Australian proposal, the Delegation feels that it would not be inconsistent for Canada to do likewise.

8. I am also enclosing as a matter of interest the text of an open letter† sent today to the Editor of the New York Times by Professor Bokhari of Pakistan which, more or less, reproduces the substance of the main speech which he made in the Third Committee.

DESPATCH 88 New York, October 21, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: My Despatch No. 59 of October 12, 1950.

ACTIVITIES OF SOCIAL COMMITTEE — LONG-RANGE ACTIVITIES FOR CHILDREN

The debate in the Third Committee on the question of the Children's Fund came to an end on Wednesday, after the Committee had decided to give precedence to the Australian proposal and had disposed of the various amendments to the original Australian draft resolution.

2. As indicated in my despatch under reference, the Australian resolution, by being voted on first by the Committee, presented the Delegates with a somewhat simplified solution to the difficult position in which the Committee had been placed as a result of the uncompromising attitude taken by some Delegations. At the request of Mrs. Roosevelt, the vote was taken by roll call. The Australian resolution was carried by forty-three votes; Canada, together with the United States, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, the Netherlands, Liberia and the Union of South Africa, voted against, with China abstaining and eight Delegates being absent. The Canadian representative on the Committee explained, prior to the voting, the attitude of our Government on this question and the reasons for which the Canadian Delegation would be voting against the Australian resolution. I am enclosing, for your information, the text of the Australian resolution† as adopted, together with the text of the statement† made by the Canadian Delegate.

3. You will note that the final text of the resolution is substantially different from the original draft submitted by the Australian Delegation; paragraph 6 (d) deserves particular consideration, since it provides for the consideration by the General Assembly, in three years' time, of the future of UNICEF "with the object of continuing the Fund on a permanent basis". You will recall that the Australian resolution had originally been made with a view to eliminating the difficulties which the question of permanency of the Fund had created for certain Delegations. This subparagraph was considered so contrary to the original intent of the Australian resolution that the Australian Delegation itself had, together with certain other Delegations, to make, in the final voting, a reservation to this particular provision.

4. I should like to add that a considerable number of those Delegations which voted in favour of the resolution hinted in their explanatory statements that they were not actually satisfied with the resolution but that they were supporting it as a gesture of compromise in order to spare the Committee from further uncompromising debate. Several Delegates also made in the course of their statements reservations to some part or other of the Australian resolution. In view of this, we may, I think, envisage the possibility of some attempt being made in the Plenary Session to have the Australian resolution, as adopted by the Third Committee, modified in such a way as to bring it closer to the spirit of the original ECOSOC resolution and yet at the same time to secure the unanimous support of all the Member States.

5. It is probably at this stage a little too early to comment on the repercussions which the adoption of this resolution might have on the question of financing UNICEF during the coming year. I think we can safely say, however, that, if the State Department is right in its estimate of Congressional feeling as reported to us by some of the members of the United States Delegation, there may be serious difficulty, following this decision, in securing further substantial contribution.

RE UNICEF

1. From the press reports and your account of the debate in Committee Three on this item, it seems unlikely that the Committee's resolution will be rejected in the General Assembly although it may be amended in some parts.

2. In our view, it would be unwise for Canada to vote against the final resolution even though it may be unsatisfactory from our point of view. You will, of course, want to make every effort to improve the resolution and, so long as there is a chance of amending the text to bring it more into line with the Canadian objective, active support should be given to any draft amendments which would serve this purpose. If the final resolution remains substantially the same as that adopted in the Committee, it would, of course, be inconsistent for Canada to support it. On the other hand, there is not much to be gained by casting a negative vote, particularly against overwhelming support. Whatever the final form of the resolution and whatever objections we may have to it on practical grounds, it will be the only proposal on this subject before the General Assembly, and to vote against it would be to vote against a United Nations programme of assistance to needy children.

3. There has always been a considerable interest in Canada in the activities of UNICEF and the Government might well be subject to serious criticism from the Canadian public if the Delegation to the Assembly were to oppose a United Nations resolution on aid to children. It is recommended, therefore, that if the resolution cannot be improved to the point where Canadian support would be reasonable, in the light of the position taken in the Committee, the Delegation should abstain. In that event you could explain that Canada did not vote against the resolution since it represents the major United Nations effort on behalf of under-privileged children, but the Delegation finds it impossible to give it positive support for various reasons, which you may or may not wish to repeat in detail.

2. As a result of a rather unexpected procedural decision by the President of the General Assembly, plenary meeting adopted yesterday without any discussion the following items:

(a) Reports of Joint Second and Third Committee;

(b) Report of Joint Second, Third and Fifth Committee;

(c) Item on long-range activities for children (Third Committee resolution as amended — unanimously — with one abstention — United States);

(d) Item on Advisory social welfare services;

(i) Third Committee report;

(ii) Fifth Committee report;

(e) Part of report of Economic and Social Council as considered by Third Committee (Canada voted against the two resolutions recommending holding of the Sub-Commission meetings which had been disapproved by ECOSOC).

3. In spite of rapidity with which the above items were voted on by plenary, we were nevertheless successful in submitting an amendment to the Third Committee resolution regarding the continuing needs of children which finally made the resolution acceptable to everyone, except unfortunately for United States abstention. Text of amendment to UNICEF resolution[88] is contained in my immediately following teletype.†

EXPANDED PROGRAMME OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

As you know, the Technical Assistance Conference, at which participating governments are expected to announce the size of their contributions to the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, is scheduled to open at Lake Success on the 16th of May. It is essential, we believe, for the success of the Conference that the United States representative should be in a position to state what the United States contribution will be. For this reason and, in view of the uncertainties now attending Congressional action on this subject, we think that consideration should be given to postponing the date of the Conference unless it is clear, at least a week in advance, that the United States contribution will have been finally fixed by the time the Conference opens. Our idea was that the Secretariat might wait until perhaps the 9th of May before coming to a decision. However, if by then it seemed virtually certain that an appropriation would not have been authorized by Congress before the 16th, the Conference should be postponed. This should not cause too much inconvenience, since we understand that most countries will be represented by members of their permanent delegations in New York.

2. We have instructed Mr. Holmes to explore this suggestion with the Secretariat. He has now reported that the Secretariat still profess to be confident that a Congressional decision will be reached in time. Should this, on review in the first week of May, appear to be a false assumption, the Secretariat would again consider whether the Conference should be held as scheduled. The member of the Secretariat with whom Holmes spoke did not say definitely that the Secretariat would postpone the Conference if it looked doubtful by that time that the United States contribution would be fixed; he promised merely that the decision to hold the Conference would be reconsidered.

3. We have also learned that the United Kingdom delegation in New York, like ourselves, have been worried about holding the Conference before Congress has reached a decision, and intend to suggest to Sir Sidney Caine[89] that he speak to Willard Thorp[90] and suggest postponement. We should be grateful if you would also discuss with Thorp the possibility of postponing the Conference. You might perhaps wish to consult with Caine before doing so.

4. You might like to know for your own information that we are now disposed to recommend to Cabinet "that the Canadian Government authorize the contribution of not more than $1,000,000 to the Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance of the United Nations, the exact amount of this contribution to be determined when the President announces the amount of the United States contribution, the Canadian contribution to be related to that of the United States in the ratio of 1:16". The reason for our proceeding in this way is that we have come to the conclusion that we will not be able to command the support of the Department of Finance in this matter (which is vital) unless the proposed Canadian contribution is tied rigidly to whatever contribution is made by the United States. The chief disadvantage, of course, of such a recommendation to Cabinet is that, if the Technical Assistance Conference is held on the 16th of May and if a United States contribution has not been decided by that time, it will be impossible for our representative to announce a Canadian contribution. In speaking to Thorp you should not disclose the exact nature of the recommendation now being considered here; but it would be proper for you to stress what he no doubt knows already, that the size of the Canadian contribution will inevitably be related to the amount which the United States makes available.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], April 25, 1950

The United Nations Technical Assistance Conference, at which the contributing countries are expected to announce the amount of their contribution for the first year of the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, is to take place at Lake Success on the 16th of May. It is, therefore, important that a Canadian contribution should be authorized before you leave Ottawa for the meetings of the North Atlantic Council. I am attaching for your signature, if you approve, a draft Memorandum to Cabinet† on this subject; and I would suggest that it might be considered in Cabinet this Thursday, the 27th of April. Also attached for your signature, if you agree, is a letter to Mr. Abbott† enclosing a copy of the Memorandum for his consideration in advance of the Cabinet meeting.

2. There have been two difficulties which have complicated the task of preparing this submission. In the first place, as you know, the Administration's recommendation for a United States appropriation for the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance has been meeting with heavy weather in Congress. When the House of Representatives considered the omnibus foreign aid authorization bill they reduced the appropriation for the Point Four Programme (that is, both for the United States contribution to the United Nations programme and also for separate United States schemes for technical assistance to be provided on a bilateral basis) from $45,000,000 to $25,000,000. The Senate is now considering a parallel omnibus authorization bill and strong opposition has been expressed by some Senators to the United Nations Technical Assistance Programme. Although, no doubt, a congressional appropriation will finally be secured for the United Nations programme, it is uncertain how large the contribution will be and how soon it will be appropriated. This uncertainty has made the preparation of our submission to Cabinet more difficult since, as you know, Canadian contributions for purposes of this kind are normally related in some way to United States contributions.

3. We feel strongly that it would be folly to proceed with the Technical Assistance Conference on the 16th of May unless it is clear that by that time the United States representative will be able to announce the size of the United States contribution; and we have instructed Mr. Holmes to explore with the Secretariat the possibility of postponing the Conference. The United Kingdom delegation in New York, we have discovered, also share our misgivings on this score. However, both the Secretariat and the State Department still profess to be confident that they will be in a position to announce the United States contribution by the 16th of May. It is, therefore, impossible to delay further a submission to Cabinet on this subject.

4. The second difficulty has been the attitude which prevails at present in the Department of Finance. After their strenuous efforts in the last few months to present to Parliament a budget that would balance, they look, not unnaturally, with a jaundiced eye on any recommendations which will involve supplementary appropriations. For a number of reasons we would have preferred to recommend to Cabinet a flat figure of $1,000,000 as the Canadian contribution. In view, however, of the resistance exhibited by the Department of Finance we have decided to modify our recommendation and put it in the form that you will find in paragraph 7 of the Memorandum to Cabinet. It is recommended there that > "the Canadian Government authorize the contribution of not more than $1,000,000 to the Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance of the United Nations, the exact amount of this contribution to be determined when the President announces the amount of the United States contribution. The Canadian contribution shall be related to that of the United States in the ratio of 1:16, the ratio of the Canadian gross national product to that of the United States.[91] This has been the usual method employed in determining Canadian contributions to international bodies."[92]

[91] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
No [A.D.P. Heeney]

5. The draft Memorandum has been shown to Mr. Deutsch of the Department of Finance; and a number of comparatively minor, but valuable suggestions which he made have been incorporated. At three points, however, the Memorandum still diverges from what he proposed:

(a) he would have preferred a ceiling of perhaps $800,000 on the Canadian contribution instead of $1,000,000;

(b) he argued, although with what firmness it was difficult to decide, that the Canadian contribution should be related to the United States contribution in the ratio of 1 to 18 rather than in the ratio of 1 to 16;

(c) he wanted the Memorandum to mention some misgivings which are felt in the Department of Finance about the way in which the scheme has been organized leaving, in their view, loopholes for waste and inefficiency.

6. We have decided not to accept these three suggestions, partly because we believe that the Memorandum as it stands at present does not ask Cabinet to authorize more than a fair Canadian contribution, and partly because we have reason to believe that, although the Department of Finance have obliged us to argue stoutly in favour of the attached submission, they would regard our total surrender with surprise and even something like contempt. So far as we have been able to gauge, the policy which they are pursuing at present is this: to force departments which are seeking appropriations to fight for them, but then, if it appears that the Department concerned is prepared to stick to its guns, to give way amicably. Officials of the Department of Finance have, therefore, been told that we are grateful for their advice but that it is, of course, for you to decide what recommendation you wish to make to Cabinet. And, although the Department of Finance has raised objections to the Memorandum as it stands at present, we believe that Mr. Bryce of the Treasury Board, who is more sympathetic with such projects than some of his colleagues, has already mentally earmarked for the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance something like $1,000,000 out of the amount available for supplementary appropriations.

Memorandum from Acting Head, United Nations Division, to Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 2, 1950

I had a telephone call from Mr. Holmes this afternoon to inform me that the Secretariat of the United Nations have now decided, on their own initiative, to postpone the Technical Assistance Conference for at least three weeks. They intend to announce simply that they have come to the conclusion that postponement would be advisable, after consultation with a number of member governments. No governments, however, will be named in the press release. Mr. Holmes has been asked by the Secretariat whether the Canadian Government would be prepared to be named as one of the governments which were consulted if, after the release has been issued, questions are asked about it. I told Mr. Holmes over the telephone that I felt sure that I could authorize him to inform the Secretariat that the Canadian Government could be mentioned as one of the member governments which had been consulted.

2. This decision by the Secretariat is very satisfactory to us, I think you will agree.[93] In particular, it relieves us of the necessity of considering any further the proposal which was made informally by Dr. Kotschnig[94] to Mr. Holmes when he was in Washington.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Tuesday afternoon Grande and I attended a meeting called by David Owen.[95] There were present representatives of twenty-five countries expected to contribute. None of the Soviet countries or Jugoslavia was invited. Owen explained at the beginning that the meeting was purely informal, and that statements made about contributions were confidential except that they might be transmitted by the representatives present to their own Governments. The statements would not be on the record, and would not be considered as committing the countries concerned.

2. Kotschnig, who spoke first, said that he expected the United States would make an outright contribution of $10 million for the period until 31st December, 1951. He said that he was also authorized to state that the United States contribution might go as high as $12 1/2 million on condition that it would not be more than 60 percent of the total contribution. The total, the United States considered, should be at least $20 million to ensure the success of the programme and to safeguard its international character.

3. Other countries were then invited to give testimony, with the following results:

(a) France will give 420 million francs ($1,200,000) if the total of contributions is approximately $20 million. If the total amount is less than that, the French contribution would be appropriately adjusted, and if it is over $20 million, the amount would be increased. For instance, if the total reached $25 million, the French contribution would be 525 million francs.

(b) The United Kingdom contribution was determined by a Cabinet decision of June 1949 (before devaluation) which established a sliding scale. If the United States contribution were considered as a mean figure between $10 and $12 1/2 million, then the United Kingdom contribution would probably be £600,000 in inconvertible sterling. The use to be made of this sterling was under discussion with the Secretariat. The United Kingdom, like the French representative, stressed their obligations for technical assistance to their own colonies.

(c) The Netherlands emphasized the facilities available in the Netherlands for technical training and the Dutch experts they could make available. Their Government was prepared, subject to Parliamentary concurrence, to make a yearly contribution equivalent to 1 1/2 million florins, or about $400,000. This sum would be available in a few weeks. It would be inconvertible, but the Dutch representative was confident, as a result of discussions with the Secretariat, that ways could be found to make use of it. When later it was explained that the United Kingdom, United States, French, and other contributions were based on an eighteen-month period ending December 1951, the Netherlands representative said that the Netherlands appropriation was for one year and that they would be prepared to contribute on this basis an amount equal to $600,000 for the period ending December 1951.

(d) Pakistan would pay .7 percent of the total contribution up to a maximum of 500,000 rupees ($130,000). 5 percent of this would be convertible into United States dollars.

(e) Sweden would give 500,000 crowns, or $96,000, for eighteen months, and would examine the possibility of making some of this available in other currencies, possibly sterling, but not in United States dollars. For budgetary reasons this money would not be available until July 1951, although there was a possibility of putting this amount at the disposal of the Fund in the first part of 1951.

(f) Norway, for a budget term of twelve months from 1st July, 1950, would contribute 250,000 crowns ($35,000), which would not be convertible.

(g) The Belgian representative said he had had no instruction from his Government, but his personal opinion was that his Government would look favourably upon a contribution based on the Belgian percentage of the United Nations budget.

(h) Lebanon's contribution would depend on that of others. It would be equal to one-third or one-half of the percentage of their contribution to the United Nations. Their contribution to the United Nations was .06 percent and that to technical assistance would be .02 percent or .03 percent, in Lebanese currency.

4. It was agreed that another meeting would be held on Wednesday, 31st May, at which other countries will be expected to announce their contributions. Owen said that on the basis of a rough calculation, $4,100,000 would still be needed to make up the required $20 million, this, of course, in addition to the United States contribution.

5. After the meeting I talked with Owen, who said that the results were "somewhat worse" than expected. He said that he understood that the United States appropriation was definitely set at $12 million and that Kotschnig had used the $10 million figure in order to stress his point that this must be a cooperative enterprise. This tactic, however, rather than encouraging others to contribute, would probably depress their contributions, as many were thinking in terms of a percentage of the United States amount. He did think $20 million was absolutely essential to launch the programme. Of this amount, not all would be useful working money, as the contributions in inconvertible funds from small countries were really more trouble than they were worth. He said that Italy and Switzerland would each probably give the equivalent of $250,000. The Russians had shown no interest at all, and he doubted if there would be a rouble contribution.

6. It is obvious that we are looked upon for the largest contribution not yet announced. The Secretariat are still hoping for one million dollars, but I have cautioned them not to count on so large an amount, particularly in view of the reduced contribution from the United States. Owen said they hoped the Commonwealth apart from the United Kingdom would make up a total of $2 million. I spoke with the Indian, Australian, South African, and New Zealand representatives, and none of them has any definite sum in mind. The Australians expect their contribution will be convertible throughout the sterling area. The United Kingdom has been playing with a scheme to pool all contributions in sterling, but I believe that the whole question of the convertibility of sterling contributions is still very much in the air.

7. As so many people are waiting to hear from us, the next meeting may be embarrassing. You may wish to consider whether it would be possible for me to express a rough and personal opinion, somewhat like that made by the Belgian, to the effect that the Canadian contribution might be expected to be roughly one sixteenth of that of the United States. I have explained to Owen informally, and to members of several friendly delegations that I personally doubted if I could make a statement until some time after the Minister's return from the London Conference.

1. Wednesday afternoon, Grande and I attended a further informal meeting called by the Secretariat to hear additional statements about contributions to the technical assistance programme. Yugoslavia was present at this meeting. Weintraub[96] was in the chair in the absence of David Owen.

2. The following statements were made:

(a) The Danish Government will ask its Parliament to authorize a contribution in Danish currency only of approximately $48,000 for the period 1st July, 1950, to 31st March, 1951, and a similar amount for the period 1st April, 1951, to 31st December, 1951. However, if the United Nations finds it difficult to obtain a total of $20,000,000 for this first eighteen-month period and other Governments decide to reconsider their contributions with a view to giving more, then the Danish Government is prepared to consider a higher contribution of not more than the equivalent of $142,000 (i.e. $71,000 for each nine-month period).

[96] David Weintraub, directeur de la Division de la stabilité et du développement économique, ministère des Affaires économiques (ONU).
David Weintraub, Director of Division of Economic Stability and Development, Department of Economic Affairs (UN).

(b) Venezuela is prepared to contribute between $35,000 and $50,000, but the Government has not yet decided what percentage of this might be convertible.

(c) Yugoslavia will probably contribute between $30,000 and $50,000, but it has not yet been decided what percentage of this might be convertible. The Yugoslav representative at the meeting said that his Government wished to take the most active possible part in the programme and they expected, as an underdeveloped country, to receive concrete assistance out of the programme.

(d) India announced a contribution of the equivalent of $250,000 entirely in rupees.

(e) Chile is considering a contribution of approximately the equivalent of $100,000.

3. There were several long periods of silence during the meeting because, as you will have noted, not many representatives were in a position to announce their Governments' contributions. Kotschnig said that if the total contribution should fall below $17,000,000, then the United States would "very definitely" have to reconsider their total contribution of $10,000,000 (with a view, supposedly, to giving less). The French representative, referring to his statement of last week, said that part of the French contribution might be convertible into other currencies, but definitely not into either United States dollars or Swiss francs.

4. Yates of the Secretariat[97] appealed to delegations to forward their formal acceptances and the credentials of their delegates to the conference as soon as possible (our teletype No. 336 of 26th May refers).† It was agreed that a further meeting would be held on Wednesday afternoon, 7th June.

5. The extreme importance was stressed by the Secretariat and several other speakers of all contributors making known their contributions at the meeting on 7th June. It was essential for the Secretariat and those participating in the Conference to know by that date at the latest the probable extent of total contributions so that they might inform their Governments and receive appropriate instructions for the Conference taking place five days later. It will be most embarrassing if we are not in a position to make even an informal statement on the 7th. We are looked to for much the largest contribution among those not yet announced. There is considerable anxiety about reaching the $20 million figure and our contribution may well mean the difference between success or failure. The United Kingdom, French, and Belgian representatives pointed out the importance for those who had established sliding scales for their contributions of knowing by 7th June the total to be expected. I shall be under constant pressure during the next few days and would be grateful to know whether you think any decision might be taken in time.

CONFIDENTIAL New York, June 1, 1950

Dear Mr. Heeney,

I should like to refer to my telegram no. 346 of 1 June and previous communications concerning the Technical Assistance Conference which is to open at Lake Success on 12 June. The present expectation is that this Conference will last two to three days. Virtually the entire time, so far as I can discover, will be devoted to statements by participating countries as to the contributions which their governments will make. There will be present at the Conference members not only of the United Nations, but also members of other countries which are members of various Specialized Agencies, such as Switzerland and Italy. Almost certainly each member of the Conference will wish to make a speech, the length of the speech possibly varying inversely with the amount of the contribution. Aside from these announcements there is not likely to be much of substance on the agenda. No doubt there will be an opportunity for certain explanatory statements from the Secretariat about the program. Further definition of the program and of the completion of arrangements will be the responsibility of the Technical Assistance Board, which is to meet later in June, and of the Technical Assistance Committee, which will meet in Geneva during the early part of the Economic and Social Council.

2. It will be necessary for the Canadian Representative to make a statement of some kind, unless we are not in a position to announce our contribution. This statement should be carefully drafted and should, I think, be prepared as soon as possible. We may expect that there will be far too many ornate speeches in Spanish and other languages, and there is no need whatsoever for us to vie with the other speakers in oratory. Nevertheless we shall probably have to do something more than merely announce the size of our contribution. It seems to me appropriate that we make a succinct statement which includes:

(a) some expression of our belief in the principle of Technical Assistance and our expectation from the United Nations program;

(b) a comment in general on the nature of the technical facilities which we could provide, with possibly some reference to what has already been done in Canada on the regular program and for U.N. Fellows;

(c) a reference to contributions which we might be making for reconstruction in the Middle East and for the Commonwealth program in South East Asia; (Countries like the U.S., U.K., France, and Belgium will almost certainly emphasize the nature of their other commitments, particularly their commitments to their undeveloped territories, and we might wish to mention that a large part of Canada remains under-developed.)

(d) an announcement of the exact terms of our contribution, with any explanatory note that might be necessary as to the point which the contribution has reached in our constitutional machinery., i.e., whether it is subject to approval by Parliament or not.

3. These are very general ideas, based to some extent on my guess as to what other countries will be saying. We should bear in mind that sixty-odd people may be expressing their enthusiasm for Technical Assistance, and therefore what we say should be brief and pointed. Our statement might be considered primarily for home consumption. The Technical Assistance Conference has attracted a good deal of attention here and it is likely to be covered pretty thoroughly by the press. We should be glad to prepare an original draft for a statement in the Delegation but we should not wish to do so without knowing what you would wish us to say. Presumably a statement could not be considered in final form until a decision as to the nature of our contribution has been taken by Cabinet.

4. You will recall that with a letter written to you by Mr. Pierce on 6 March,† there were enclosed a draft final act of the Technical Assistance Conference and two draft resolutions prepared by the Secretariat. The Canadian Representative at the Conference would need instructions on the attitude he should take towards these documents. As I understand it, the documents stand as they did when they were given to Mr. Pierce in March.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN W. HOLMES

P.S. Copies of the documents referred to in paragraph 4 have also been sent to you as issued by the Secretariat under cover of our despatch no. 438 of 13 May.†

SECRET Ottawa, June 3, 1950

My dear Colleague,

I should be grateful for your views on the enclosed two draft memoranda of May 29† which have been prepared in this Department for submission to Cabinet: one on a Canadian contribution to the United Nations Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance to the Under-developed Countries; the other on a contribution to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.[98]

2. The Technical Assistance Conference, at which participating governments will be expected to indicate the amount of their contributions, will begin on June 12,

[98] Voir le document 346./See Document 346.

1950, and it will therefore be necessary to bring before Cabinet next week the question of the Canadian contribution to the technical assistance programme. It would also be desirable to bring before Cabinet at the same time the question of the Canadian contribution to Palestine refugees as this is an urgent matter.

3. I think we should keep in mind at the same time the anticipated request for a Canadian contribution to the technical assistance fund which the recent meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee in Sydney accepted in principle.[99] However, I should not think that any Canadian contribution to this fund would exceed five hundred thousand dollars for the first year of operation.

4. The enclosed draft memoranda recommend that $1 million be contributed to the United Nations Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance, and $1.5 million to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees. Both contributions would be for the period ending December 31, 1951. The total sum which Cabinet may be asked to authorize within the year thus amounts to $3 million if my tentative preliminary estimate concerning a contribution to the Commonwealth fund is included.

5. The present is a critical phase in the struggle with the expansionism of Russian Communism. In Europe, Communism takes a form which is very familiar. In those parts of the world where political consciousness on a wide scale is comparatively recent, however, in South and South East Asia and in Latin America, it presents new problems. There the peoples, aware of their under-developed economies and conscious of their new national freedom are demanding assistance from the Western world and equality with its states. Many of these demands are, as you know, premature and excessive. But the communities from which they come are peculiarly open to the leadership of demagogues and, in particular, the skilful propaganda of Russian inspired Communist doctrine.

6. The only antidote to this danger, so far as can be seen, is the close association of these areas of potential revolution with the free democratic world by extending to them material assistance and organized technical guidance which will enable them to develop their resources and acquire, in doing so, the capacity to administer their own affairs. In the process there will be an opportunity to win their cooperation and to weaken the influence of Communism.

7. The proposals for assistance mentioned above have been drawn up after prolonged and, I believe, realistic study of what is needed and what can most effectively be done. The plans aim at putting an end to direct relief as quickly as possible and instituting programmes of self-help and responsibility. The inhabitants of these undeveloped areas will be trained and given the equipment to work and to learn to shoulder their own tasks in economic, social and political matters. It was this situation that was recognized by the Commonwealth foreign ministers at Colombo and was the basis of the Consultative Committee that was then established.

8. In face of the serious political problem created by the current situation in these areas, these three programmes represent, I think, a reasonable contribution from this country. The undertaking is admittedly new and experimental, and the extension of technical assistance on this scale will be complex and difficult. At the same time I am convinced that it is in the Canadian interest to support it, and I am therefore most anxious to have your judgment on the proposal as a whole.

9. Your Deputy Minister might perhaps have a word with mine on this subject. However, I am anxious to discuss it with our Colleagues in Cabinet next week and I hope it will not be necessary to delay decisions on these important questions.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

Reference our teletype No. 346 of 1st June and previous correspondence — technical assistance.

1. On Wednesday, 7th June, Grande and I attended a third informal meeting called by the Secretariat to hear additional statements about contributions to the technical assistance programme. The following statements were made:

(a) After referring to Australia's commitments for technical assistance to South-East Asia, the Australian representative announced that his Government was prepared to contribute the equivalent of $600,000 in inconvertible Australian currency. The Australian Government may agree to the conversion of part of this contribution into other soft currencies and at the same time may restrict its use to certain groups of services.

(b) The Indonesian Government will contribute 463,000 Indonesian guilders, which is equivalent to approximately $122,000. Five percent of this will be convertible into other soft currencies, but not into United States dollars.

(c) The Iranian Government will contribute approximately the equivalent of $40,000, mostly in pounds sterling, the details to be worked out with the Secretariat.

(d) The Egyptian Government will contribute 28,500 Egyptian pounds, payable only in Egyptian funds. (The conversion rate is approximately $2.87 for each Egyptian pound.)

(e) The Italian representative, after stressing Italy's heavy commitments for national reconstruction, announced that his Government would contribute the equivalent of approximately $50,000. It will be decided later what portion of this may be convertible into hard currency.

(f) Switzerland will contribute, subject to Parliamentary approval, 1,000,000 Swiss francs, which is equivalent to $230,000. Except when special arrangements are made, this will have to be used for Swiss services.

(g) The Israeli Government will contribute 10,000 Israeli pounds, which is equivalent to $28,000.

(h) Korea will make a token contribution of $5,000.

(i) Ceylon will announce its contribution on Monday.

(j) The French Government has decided that in no case will its contribution be less than the equivalent of $1,200,000. If the total amount received is more than $20,000,000, then the French will consider giving even more.

(k) It is practically certain that the United Kingdom will give £700,000 in inconvertible sterling if the total amount contributed is at least $17,000,000. If the total is more than $20,000,000 the United Kingdom might then contribute more than £700,000.

2. I said briefly that although I was not in a position to announce the decision of the Canadian Government, I had every expectation that such an announcement could be made at the Technical Assistance Conference. For the purpose of calculation, however, I could say quite informally that I expected the Canadian contribution would be larger than its percentage of the United Nations budget (a point which the Secretariat and the Americans were anxious that I stress in order to encourage others) and that it would probably be in the nature of $750,000 Canadian. As no questions were asked about convertibility of our contribution, I thought it best to say nothing.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE CONFERENCE

1. I asked the Secretary of the Conference if the Canadian statement could be made on Tuesday, and he said that he thought this could be arranged. There is a good chance, I think, that the Monday sessions will be entirely taken up with statements by other countries. However, only twenty-three countries have declared themselves in preliminary meetings and I believe that there is a general reluctance to speak in the early stages. It may be, therefore, that it would be awkward for the Canadian representative to put off his statement until Tuesday. If necessary, of course, he could make a preliminary statement in which he would say that he would prefer to announce the decision of the Canadian Government on the following day. It would be helpful, therefore, if the representative could be supplied by the time the Conference opens with a draft statement with the exact amount of the contribution left blank. If you could fill in this blank during the course of Monday, perhaps you might telephone the figure the minute it is available.

2. In my letter of June 1st to Mr. Heeney, I made suggestions as to the kind of statement which might be made. If at all possible, we should like to receive a draft by tomorrow so that there would be time for any changes which we might like to suggest as a result of our discussions with other delegations in New York.

3. You may prefer that the announcement of the Canadian contribution be made in Ottawa rather than Lake Success. In that case I should be grateful if you could let me know what arrangements will be made for making such an announcement so that the Canadian representative at the Conference could endeavour to time his speech accordingly.

4. Both the Secretariat and the delegation would be interested to know the name of the Canadian representative. Most of the representatives have now been announced in a paper put out by the Secretariat. For the most part, countries have named both representatives and alternate representatives. These representatives are either permanent representatives or Consuls-General in New York, or alternatively, members of Washington Embassies.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

Your telegram No. 361 of 8th of June. Technical Assistance Conference.

We have every confidence in your ability to draft a masterly statement to be made at the Conference. The purpose of this teletype is to transmit additional suggestions and to comment on the proposals contained in your letter of the 1st of June addressed to Mr. Heeney.

2. We agree that it would be appropriate for the Canadian statement to mention the four points made in your letter. You may like to have the following comments on the topics you proposed:

(a) With regard to your point (a), we believe that it would be worthwhile to include some of the opinions expressed in the "guidepost" memorandum which was sent to you recently. This memorandum is being revised in the light of the discussion at a meeting held here on Thursday the 8th of June. The revised memorandum will be sent to you before the end of the week. However, the opinions expressed in the first draft have not been substantially altered;

(b) With regard to your point (b), we feel that an indication should be given that the Canadian Government will pay serious attention to facilitating the recruitment of experts in Canada and the placing of trainees from abroad in Canadian industries and educational institutions. You might care to mention that Canada has had considerable experience in meeting the problems which arise in the course of developing an unexploited country and that this experience may be useful to the underdeveloped countries. You might also mention that Canada has been participating in the regular United Nations Programme of Technical Assistance although the scale of Canadian participation hardly justifies more than a passing reference;

(c) With regard to your point (c), you might say that the Canadian Government, like other Commonwealth Governments, has under consideration a recommendation that it contribute to the proposed Commonwealth Programme of Technical Assistance for the countries of South and South-East Asia;

(d) As you suggest in your point (d), it would be wise to inform the Conference that the announced Canadian contribution will be subject to approval by Parliament.

3. We will let you know by telephone on Monday, 12th of June, of the amount of the Canadian contribution.

4. Mr. Pearson has signed a Note† to the Secretary-General to inform him that you have been nominated as the Canadian Delegate to the Conference. This Note, along with a copy for you, will go forward in today's bag.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], June 10, 1950

SIZE OF THE CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS EXPANDED PROGRAMME OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

In the memorandum on this subject which is to be considered by Cabinet on Monday, the 12th of June, it is recommended that the Canadian contribution to the United Nations Expanded Programme should be "either $1,000,000 or $750,000". It has been necessary to make the recommendation in this somewhat odd way because we have not been able to agree with the Department of Finance on the size of the Canadian contribution. Although the Department of Finance would be willing to support a recommendation for a contribution of $750,000, they are not prepared to concur in a recommendation of $1,000,000.

2. The reasons why we still are anxious that the Canadian contribution should be $1,000,000 are as follows:

(a) This is a matter in which we believe it is proper for Canada to give a lead to other countries.

(b) A contribution of less that $1,000,000 when set alongside the contribution of $500,000 which Mr. Mayhew has recommended as the Canadian share in the Commonwealth Programme of Technical Assistance for South and South-East Asia, would suggest that we regard the two programmes as of almost equal importance. (You will recall that contributions to the United Nations Programme cover an 18-month period, whereas the contributions to the Commonwealth Programme cover only a 12-month period).

3. There appear to be two reasons why the Department of Finance are unwilling to agree to a contribution of $1,000,000 to the United Nations Programme:

(a) They doubt whether it will prove possible to spend this amount of money in Canadian funds either in bringing personnel from the under-developed countries to Canada for training or in sending Canadian experts abroad.

(b) A Canadian contribution of $1,000,000 would be larger than an amount reached by dividing the United States contribution by 16, on the basis that the relation of the Canadian national income to that of the United States is approximately 1 to 16. It would also exceed the sum that would be reached by basing the Canadian contribution on the proportion which Canada is assessed for the regular United Nations budget. Since the United Nations Expanded Programme is expected to be a more or less permanent feature of United Nations activities, the Department of Finance are nervous about offering, as a first annual contribution, a sum larger than would be suggested by the application of either one of these two automatic criteria.

4. There is, of course, some substance in both arguments. It will be difficult to find in Canada either sufficient experts or places in training institutions to meet the requirements of the United Nations Programme and the Commonwealth Programme for South and South-East Asia. The proper answer to this argument, I believe, is that we must exert ourselves to make use of all our available facilities and, indeed, if need be, to expand them. However, the fact that the Department of Finance have shown no hesitation in agreeing to Mr. Mayhew's recommendation of a contribution of $500,000 for the Commonwealth Programme would suggest that the Department of Finance are more worried on the second score than on the first. You will, perhaps, want to point out in Cabinet, if this comparative argument is raised, that in considering the relation of the Canadian contribution to the United Nations Programme to that of the United States it would be appropriate to take into account the total amount being currently expended in the United States on technical assistance, both bilaterally and through the United Nations, as well as the total amount proposed as the Canadian expenditure in this field. When viewed in that light, a contribution of $1,000,000 to the United Nations Programme, together with a contribution of $500,000 to the Commonwealth Programme would not seem excessive. You might also wish to urge that it would hardly be fair for Canada to insist that its contribution to the Technical Assistance Fund of the United Nations should be kept within the figure indicated by the use of the formula which determines the Canadian contribution to the regular budget of the United Nations. The regular budget includes, of course, contributions from all the under-developed countries. Contributions from these countries to the Technical Assistance Fund could not be more than token payments; and, even as such, they might be more of a nuisance than anything else.

5. If there is much opposition in Cabinet to a Canadian contribution of $1,000,000 room might be found for a compromise by suggesting that our contribution to the Commonwealth Programme be reduced to $400,000 a year, which would enable us to increase our United Nations contribution to $900,000 for the first eighteen months. The ratio between $400,000 for the Commonwealth Programme and $900,000 for the United Nations Programme would reflect more fairly, I believe, the relative importance of the two schemes. You may have noticed that a contribution of $750,000 for the United Nations Programme, spread over eighteen months, when set beside an annual contribution of $500,000 for the Commonwealth Programme, would suggest that we attach equal importance to the two schemes.

6. There are two considerations, however, which should make you cautious, I think, about proposing such a compromise. In the first place, unless in the course of the discussion you had secured Mr. Abbott's firm concurrence to a Canadian contribution of $500,000 for the Commonwealth scheme, the switch of expenditure which I have mentioned might result merely in a decrease of our contribution to the Commonwealth scheme without any corresponding increase in our United Nations contribution. Secondly, you may find that such a compromise would not prove attractive to the Department of Finance since, as I have suggested, what they seem to be concerned about is not so much the budgetary increase which our participation in the two programmes would involve this year, but rather the relation of our proposed United Nations contribution both to the United States contribution and to our assessment for the regular United Nations budget.

7. You might like to know that the Australian Government has already announced that it will contribute the equivalent of $600,000 (U.S.) to the United Nations Programme, or approximately $660,000 Canadian. This would be in addition to the contribution of some $2,400,000 which they have promised to the Commonwealth Programme.

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 158-50 [Ottawa, n.d.]

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS EXPANDED PROGRAMME FOR TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE TO THE UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

The Technical Assistance Conference will begin at Lake Success on June 12, 1950. Participating governments will be expected to state the amount of their contribution to the Special Account of the Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance to provide funds for the first year of the Programme's operation.

2. On December 21, 1949, Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance of the United Nations, and approved Canadian participation in the Technical Assistance Conference.[100]

3. The Expanded Technical Assistance Programme was established by a unanimous General Assembly resolution in November, 1949. Its general aim is to help the under-developed nations to help themselves in improving their economic and social conditions. It does not provide for relief or free gifts.

4. The Special Account of the Expanded Programme will be used:

(1) to pay the salaries of the experts and advisers who will be sent to the under-developed countries to assist in development projects;

(2) to meet the cost of training students from the under-developed countries in the universities and industries of the more advanced countries;

(3) to set up pilot projects whenever appropriate.

5. The expanded Programme is a constructive United Nations plan to confer on the more backward peoples of the world some of the technical advantages of western production and organization, and thereby enable them to develop self-reliance and to learn how to improve their standard of living by their own efforts. This will, at one and the same time, meet the widespread demand amongst under-developed peoples for a share in the benefits of western progress and offer a concrete retort to the promises and allurements of Russian Communism.

6. Participation in the Programme will also extend the knowledge of Canadian technical achievement and assist in developing markets for Canadian exports. It will give an opportunity for Canadian experts to be employed in various fields abroad; and students coming to Canada for training under the Programme will take back with them firsthand knowledge of Canadian industry and production.

[100] Voir DREC, volume 15, document 224 note 73./See DCER, Volume 15, Document 224*n*73.

7. Between 1940 and the end of 1949, the United States Government spent approximately $63,000,000 on various schemes for technical assistance, mainly in Latin America. On February 20, 1950, a Bill known as the "Act for International Development" was presented to Congress to finance President Truman's Point Four Programme. When final Congressional approval has been obtained, it is expected that an amount between $10,000,000 and $12,500,000 will be contributed by the United States to the United Nations' Programme for the eighteen-month period ending December 31, 1951. This Bill has been authorized by both Houses of the United States Congress, where it was agreed to support an appropriation of $35,000,000, covering both a bilateral programme and a contribution to the Expanded Programme of the United Nations. The Bill has been signed by the President and now awaits action by both Houses in the Appropriations stage.

8. It is recommended that the Canadian Government authorize a contribution of either $1,000,000 or $750,000 to the United Nations Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance for the eighteen-month period ending December 31, 1951.

9. It is further recommended that the Canadian contribution, in Canadian dollars, be deposited in Canada to the account of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and that withdrawals be subject to such conditions as may be agreed between the Secretary-General and the Canadian Government. In this regard, authorization is sought for the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to act jointly in the name of the Canadian Government.

10. A Technical Assistance Committee, composed of representatives of the 18 countries which are members of the Economic and Social Council, will exercise continuing supervision over the Programme. Canada will be a member of this Committee for 3 years and should therefore be able to ensure that the funds of the Programme are expended with the maximum effectiveness.

11. It is also recommended that the Department of External Affairs in consultation with other interested departments be directed to develop machinery to plan and co-ordinate Canadian participation in the Expanded Programme.

12. As a result of the recent meeting in Sydney of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee on South and South East Asia, at which a Commonwealth programme of technical assistance for that area was agreed on in principle, the Minister of Fisheries has recommended that Canada should also contribute to this additional programme of technical assistance designed to supplement the United Nations programme. This recommendation, and the amount and form of such a proposed contribution, remain to be considered by Cabinet at a later date.

UNITED NATIONS PROGRAMME FOR TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the Technical Assistance Conference of the United Nations had begun that day at Lake Success. Participating governments would be expected to state the amount of their contributions to the special account of the expanded programme for technical assistance. The special account would be used to pay salaries of experts sent to under-developed countries to assist in development projects; to meet the cost of training students from under-developed countries; and to set up pilot projects where appropriate.

It was expected that the United States would contribute an amount between $10 and $12.5 million to the programme for the 18-month period ending December 31st, 1951. It was recommended that for the same period the Canadian Government authorize a contribution of either $1 million or $750,000.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, undated, Cab. Doc. 158-50).

8. The Minister of Finance thought that a contribution of $750,000 would be more strictly comparable with that of the United States than one of $1 million. There seemed no adequate reason for increasing the contribution beyond the strictly comparable figure.

9. Mr. Pearson was of the opinion that the United Nations programme and the one agreed on at the Sydney Conference of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee on South and South-east Asia had to be considered jointly. The United Nations programme was likely to be the more important and the Canadian contribution to it should be on a larger scale than to the Sydney programme. He had planned to recommend a contribution to the latter of $500,000. In the circumstances, however, it might be preferable to increase the contribution to the United Nations' fund by $100,000 over the figure suggested by the Minister of Finance and reduce the contribution to the Commonwealth fund accordingly.

10. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed:

(a) that a contribution of $850,000 be made to the United Nations expanded programme for technical assistance for the 18-month period ending December 31st, 1951;

(b) that the contribution, in Canadian dollars, be deposited in Canada to the account of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and withdrawal be subject to conditions agreed between the Secretary-General and the Government; the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to act jointly in the name of the Government for such purposes; and,

(c) that the Department of External Affairs, in consultation with other interested departments, develop a programme to plan and co-ordinate Canadian participation in the expanded programme.

DESPATCH 287 New York, June 15, 1950

Sir,

I have the honour to report on the Technical Assistance Conference, which completed its three-day session on Wednesday afternoon, 14 June. This conference was attended by representatives of forty-six United Nations member countries and eight other countries which are members of participating Specialized Agencies (Austria, Ceylon, Finland, Indonesia, Ireland, Italy, Korea, Monaco). None of the countries of Eastern Europe, with the exception of Yugoslavia, participated in the Conference. A Yugoslav resolution inviting the Government of the People's Republic of China to attend the Conference was defeated by a vote of 26 to 9 (Burma, Ceylon, Denmark, India, Indonesia, Israel, Norway, Sweden and Yugoslavia), with 13 abstentions (Australia, Austria, Egypt, Finland, France, Lebanon, Monaco, Netherlands, Pakistan, the United Kingdom, Switzerland, Syria and Yemen). According to unofficial estimates the approximate sum total of contributions pledged at the Conference is the equivalent of $20,012,500 (U.S.). It is hoped that further contributions will be received from states which were not able to pledge anything at this time. South Africa and Ireland, for instance, have yet to announce how much they will contribute to the Special Fund.

2. The Conference was almost entirely devoted to the hearing of statements of varying lengths announcing how much each government was prepared to contribute for the first period of the expanded program ending on 31 December, 1951. As expected the length of the statement varied inversely with the amount of the contribution in most cases. Some statements, such as that of Mr. Fabregat[101] of Uruguay, took us step by step through the complete economic development and history of the country concerned. (Mr. Fabregat also announced that as a gesture of goodwill and international solidarity his Government was giving to each of the members present a free copy of a Uruguayan Government booklet telling us how great were the achievements of Uruguay in various relevant fields.) Other statements, notably that of Sir Carl Berendsen of New Zealand, consisted of about ten words agreeing with the resolutions and announcing the amount of the contribution.

Enrique Rodriguez Fabregat, Representative of Uruguay to United Nations.

3. The Indian statement was perhaps the keynote address on the part of the under-developed countries. Mr. Saksena[102] emphasized that the "wherewithal" to carry through the Technical Assistance Program would have to be provided by the wealthier members of the international community for some time to come. He seemed somewhat disappointed that the "giving" countries were not giving more and thus, presumably, that the receiving countries would not be able to receive more. "What we need," said Mr. Saksena "is 'dynamic action'." The under-developed countries could not be expected to make more than a token contribution as a gesture of their interest and goodwill. Let us hope, he said, that the doubts and fears which several countries had about the shortcomings of the expanded program would be dispelled by the events of the future. He found ominous the use of the words "modest" and "gradual" — a remark which might well have been inspired by the canny approach of the Canadian Delegation. The Colombian representative struck a slightly sour note by referring with some bitterness and in vague terms to a recommendation of a Senate Sub-Committee in Washington regarding coffee production in American countries. At the following meeting Mr. Kotschnig assured the Colombian Delegation that any action to be taken in Washington would certainly reflect the United States' traditional concern for the welfare of its neighbors. It is worthy of note that the Bolivian representative referred in grateful tones to the Technical Assistance Mission which is at present in his country. In this connection he mentioned Dr. Keenleyside who heads this Mission.

4. I think it fair to say that most of the Delegations and the Secretariat officials concerned were generally satisfied with the results of the Conference. After some last minute additional contributions the Conference was able to announce that it had reached the goal of $20,000,000 which it had set for itself. This, of course, is considerably less than what was expected at the beginning of 1949 when this expanded program was first contemplated. However, it is generally believed that $20,000,000 is all that the program can spend effectively in this first 18-month period.

5. I am enclosing a list† of the approximate contributions pledged by each country at the Conference. It probably will be extremely difficult to administer the smaller contributions which have been pledged by several countries and which are not convertible. Nevertheless, the emphasis in the past several months has been on universal giving and it was in this spirit that such countries as Korea and Haiti and bankrupt Nationalist China announced token contributions which are very small. The Americans were particularly anxious to raise the total of non-United States contributions in order to impress Congress.

6. The Technical Assistance Board will now meet to consider specific requests for technical assistance. It is expected that the Board will report to the Economic and Social Council through its Technical Assistance Committee at the end of this month. The official report of the Conference will be forwarded to you as soon as it has been circulated. You will have noted from the very full reports which have been carried on the United Nations teleprinter wire that the two resolutions on contributions and on allocations were approved unanimously.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

1. I have had an interesting talk with Mr. Gordon Menzies, Acting Chief of the Technical Assistance Section of the United Nations Secretariat, about the Canadian role in the Technical Assistance Program. Some time ago Menzies asked me to have a talk with him, but in view of the pressure of other events, and the absence of Mr. Grande on leave, I was unable to see him until Wednesday of this week. Menzies, who is an Australian, direct in manner like his compatriots, began by saying (in an informal and friendly manner which should not be resented) that Canada seemed to be "dragging her feet" with regard to Technical Assistance. He quickly added that Australia was doing even worse, and he intended having a straight forward talk about this with "Bob Menzies", (no relation, I presume) when he came to New York next week.

2. To begin with, Menzies said he was disturbed by a communication which the Secretary-General had received from Ottawa, to the effect that we would not be using very much pressure to supply experts for the program. I said that I thought he must have misinterpreted our views. He thereupon produced a file on which I could see a communication that had obviously come direct from the Department. When Menzies glanced at the communication, he seemed a little less positive in his interpretation of the Canadian views and implied that this was not the communication to which he had referred. I have not been able to find copies on our files of any recent communications from the Department to the Secretary-General on the subject of Technical Assistance.

3. Menzies' principal point was that we in Canada had not yet taken steps to establish a national organization to handle the Technical Assistance Program, and in particular to handle a Program which would account for $850,000 in 18 months. He summarized briefly for me a memorandum which he had just prepared for Mr. David Owen to circulate to the ECOSOC Representatives at Geneva. This memorandum proposed an elaborate machinery in the principal contributing countries. Menzies recommended the establishment of an inter-ministerial committee with a Secretariat. This committee would not only coordinate the work of Government Departments, but would also reach out to establish contact with universities, engineering and scientific societies, private industry, and, in our case, provincial governments. He thought that panels might be set up which would include representatives of various non-governmental organizations. The panels would be useful not only for finding experts and facilities for training, but also for coordinating technical information arising out of Canadian experience, which might be provided for other Governments. In other words, he seemed to envisage that the Technical Assistance Program could be furthered not only by the provision of people, but also by the provision of documents and reports. Furthermore, he thought that the panels would be useful in spreading word about the Technical Assistance Program and in animating interest and support among the people as a whole. He suggested that consideration might be given to the possibilities of making use of national contributions to the special fund to cover the expenses of maintaining the staff to deal with Technical Assistance.

4. Mr. Menzies went on to say that they were looking more to Canada than to almost any other country for Technical Assistance. They had now received 141 requests for assistance, and were finding it extremely difficult to secure the persons or the facilities. In the first place, most of the requests were for English or French-speaking experts, and this qualification limited the number of countries which could be helpful. Furthermore, there were all kinds of political difficulties. Pakistan and other Moslem countries had indicated that they would not welcome Jews as experts. Some Arab countries would not have Americans or nationals of any country which had, in their view, supported Israel. In some cases there were prejudices against the Dutch, the British, or the French. Canadians were about the only people that everyone was prepared to accept.

5. Mr. Menzies went on to say that the Secretariat were determined to maintain the integrity of the Technical Assistance Program by providing only the best experts available. Already they were forced to resist special pleading. He mentioned that the French were very active in putting forward their candidates, and were trying to persuade countries to make special requests for French technical assistance. He concluded with a strong plea to us to realize that people were our best export, and that, although he perhaps ought not to say it, we should realize the good-will towards Canada which would be created by our active participation. He cited, for instance, the "enormous good-will" towards Canada created by Dr. Keenleyside in Bolivia.

6. I told Mr. Menzies that there was no absence of belief in the Technical Assistance Program in Canada, and that there was a very sincere desire to do all we possibly could, evidence of which was the very substantial contribution we had made. We were faced, however, with serious problems. The machinery which he mentioned was certainly desirable, and would accomplish a great deal. However, it was very difficult to set it up by a wave of the hand. There was extremely heavy pressure upon our civil servants, and however desirable inter-departmental committees might be, they were not easy to form. I pointed out, furthermore, unlike the French who might have a number of unemployed experts, we were still in the process of a phenomenal expansion in Canada which meant that there were very few Canadian technical experts available for employment, and that there was also extremely heavy pressure upon experts in the Government service.

7. I should be grateful if you could let me know what plans are being considered for handling technical assistance matters in Ottawa.

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 302-50 Ottawa, December 27, 1950

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMMES

On June 12, 1950, the Cabinet authorized a contribution of $850,000 for the first eighteen months' operation of the United Nations Expanded Technical Assistance Programme and instructed the Department of External Affairs, in consultation with other interested departments, to consider what steps should be taken to develop machinery to plan and coordinate Canadian participation in this project. At the same time, the Cabinet authorized a Canadian contribution of $400,000 for the first twelve months' operation of the Commonwealth-sponsored Technical Assistance Programme for South and South-East Asia, which has since become known as the Colombo Plan for Technical Co-operation in South and South-East Asia.

2. It is considered that any machinery set up within the Canadian Government should coordinate all Canadian activities with regard to technical assistance either

(a) with the United Nations or its Specialized Agencies;

(b) with the Bureau of the Co-operative Plan for Technical Assistance to South and South-East Asia; or

(c) in response to direct requests from foreign governments.

3. It is recommended that a unit should be located in the Department of Trade and Commerce which should have responsibility for its administration. A standing interdepartmental group on technical assistance should be established to whom the director would report regularly with regard to the operation of the unit and from whom he would regularly seek guidance with respect to policy. Members of this interdepartmental group should be drawn from External Affairs (which should provide the Chairman), Labour, Trade and Commerce, Agriculture, Finance, Mines and Technical Surveys, National Health and Welfare, the Bank of Canada and the Civil Service Commission. The interdepartmental group should have access to the Interdepartmental Committee on International Organizations.

4. It is further recommended that:

(a) It should be drawn to the attention of all federal government departments and agencies that their co-operation, both in respect of encouraging employees to accept temporary positions abroad under these programmes and in making available to trainees facilities in their fields of activity, is essential for effective Canadian participation in the technical assistance programmes. The importance attached to the success of these programmes may justify sacrifices on the part of some government departments.

(b) It should be drawn to the attention of federal civil servants that, when a federal civil servant with the consent of his department accepts a temporary appointment under an approved technical assistance scheme, his civil service position will be held open for him. The seniority of the employee on loan will not be affected. Superannuation rights and benefits will be maintained, but the six per cent contribution will be levied only on the amount of his civil service salary at the time of his recruitment. Everything possible will be done to ensure that he will be at no disadvantage by reason of his absence. A civil servant recruited under the Colombo Plan will receive special allowances over and above his regular salary to compensate for added responsibilities, inconvenience and increased expenditures.

(3) Canadians who may be recruited to go abroad under the Colombo Plan for Technical Co-operation will come within the definition of "residents" as set forth in Section 127 (iii) of the Income Tax Act. Further, such employees will also be "officers or servants of Canada" for purposes of the application of the Income Tax Act. The salaries or wages of these employees will consequently be subject to tax in Canada but any "special allowances received in respect of their period of absence from Canada" come within the exemption provided by Section 5(B)(iii) of the Income Tax Act and will be exempt from income tax.[103]

KASHMIR

Following for Mr. Pearson from Heeney. There have been no further developments of importance in New York in regard to Kashmir since Security Council meeting at which McNaughton tabled his proposals. Replies of both parties have been exchanged, and McNaughton has received and transmitted comments of each party on reply made by the other one. These comments have not indicated any reasonable hope of amending proposals made by McNaughton to satisfaction of both parties.

2. Security Council has not yet been called for meeting in January on Kashmir. Riddell suggested informally to Smith that, if no obvious purpose was to be served by holding a meeting immediately, it might be preferable to defer further discussion of Kashmir in Council until after Colombo Conference. This suggestion was passed on to U.K. and U.S. representatives in New York who seem mistakenly to have taken it as a proposal that discussions be transferred to Ceylon Conference. They referred it to their governments which, as might have been expected, objected to any action which seemed to be taking the subject out of the hands of the Security Council. They agreed, however, that there might be considerable advantage in postponing a further meeting of the Council on Kashmir until the Conference in Colombo had been concluded. It has been agreed that this course of action will be suggested to Tsiang. Since Tsiang will certainly have an uncomfortable time whenever the Council meets, he may well concur in the suggestion for postponement.

3. Delegation is uncertain in regard to plans of Bajpai and Zafrulla Khan. Bajpai hinted that he might soon be returning to India, adding that he thought it unlikely that he would go to Ceylon. Zafrulla Khan has gone to Washington on a visit, and it is unlikely that he will go to Ceylon unless it becomes certain that Kashmir will not be discussed in Security Council until Colombo Conference is over.

[104] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Text of this telegram was reviewed and approved at meeting held on Friday Jan[uary] 6 attended by Mr Heeney, Mr Feaver, Mr Holmes, Mr Weld and myself. R.G. R[iddell].

4. McNaughton and Smith believe that no further progress can be made in negotiations until there is a basic change in the attitude of one or other of the parties. They consider that India is deliberately attempting to prevent a plebiscite from being held in the hope that force of circumstance will finally lead Pakistan to accept partition. Pakistan on the other hand will continue to hold firm to original commitment that future of Kashmir as a whole shall be settled by plebiscite. They think, therefore, that before further progress can be made, position of parties must change in one of two ways. Either India must accept arrangements which will make it possible for plebiscite to be taken, without prior commitment being given in regard to partition (with possible exception of Pakistan suggestion that minor border adjustments might take place following plebiscite); or alternatively, Pakistan must agree to settlement by partition either before or after plebiscite is held. Delegation does not believe that any mere adjustment in text of resolution as it now stands will result in agreement.

5. Meanwhile, during McNaughton's absence in Newfoundland, Delegation continues to be pressed by United States and United Kingdom for agreement that he should continue to act as mediator. If McNaughton were to accept, it seems certain that some means could be found to extend his mandate. He has insisted, however, that he will not consider continuing to act unless he is specifically requested to do so by both parties and unless at the same time one or both of the parties indicates a modification of position which would make it possible for him to proceed with some chance of success.

6. I am advising General McNaughton to hold firmly to this position. As matters now stand, therefore, I do not think it probable that he will be requested to accept further responsibilities in regard to Kashmir. Meanwhile, we have been wondering whether there is any possibility of securing a renewal of the negotiations. It has occurred to us that there might be some possibility of securing agreement between Indian and Pakistani representatives at Colombo to some formula which would make it possible for negotiations to proceed. Before you left Ottawa, you suggested that a United Nations mediator with general terms of reference might be agreed upon. It seems to us, however, that functions of such a mediator would almost certainly have to be within the framework of the provisions of UNCIP resolutions accepted by both sides. In other words, he should be instructed to secure agreement between the parties to conditions which would make it possible to demilitarize Kashmir and proceed with the plebiscite, and to formulate any other proposals for a general settlement on which the parties might agree. This last clause in his terms of reference might enable him eventually to broach the question of partition, but only as a part of the plebiscite procedures, or as a proposal arising out of the results of the plebiscite. You are aware of course that United Kingdom and United States authorities both consider that best course now would be to put pressure on India to modify its position.

7. It occurs to us that you might find that question of McNaughton's future role in the negotiations, if any, would provide the occasion for discussions with Indian and Pakistani delegations. This is one reason why we thought it preferable for next meeting of the Council on Kashmir to be postponed, at least until Colombo Conference had convened, if that is possible. Ends.

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for Mr. Pearson, Begins: Following is text of teletype No. WA-42 received from Washington today concerning Kashmir.
Text begins: Secret. Kashmir Dispute.

1. Mr. Acheson said yesterday to the British Ambassador and myself that he had just despatched messages to our two Foreign Ministers on this subject. He strongly favours the continuation of General McNaughton's efforts on behalf of the Security Council. In his view the next stage, to be achieved as promptly as possible, should be for General McNaughton to prepare a concise statement setting forth the points of difference which are preventing progress towards a settlement on the lines approved by the Security Council. This statement should narrow the issues and reveal exactly what specific points must be overcome by compromise or concession by either or both of the parties to the dispute.

2. I understand that the message to Mr. Pearson was despatched to the United States Embassy in Ottawa last night with instructions to deliver it to the Department at once for transmission to Mr. Pearson in Colombo. I gather that its general tenor is to urge Mr. Pearson (and Mr. Bevin in the similar message sent to him) to use every endeavour to bring the parties together.

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for Mr. Pearson, Begins: Reference my immediately preceding telegram No. 5.†
Following is text of message to you from Mr. Acheson delivered today by United States Embassy. Message begins:

The United States Embassy has received the following message from Mr. Acheson for Mr. Pearson.

"I have been gravely troubled by Patel's[105] statement of January fourth that the relations between India and Pakistan have become so strained that they are capable of provoking war. Coming as they do in the midst of an economic war between the two dominions and the lack of progress in current effort to reach a solution in the Kashmir dispute, Patel's words may have a prophetic ring. As you know, General McNaughton has been doing his best by direct talks in New York to bring the parties together on a preliminary agreement which will lay a basis for a final solution in Kashmir. Despite his earnest efforts, he has not so far been able to make much headway although Pakistan has proved more cooperative than India, and it looks now as though some additional impetus is necessary to remove the obstacles to the successful continuation of these mediatory efforts. It is unthinkable that these two members of the Commonwealth should reach a stalemate in negotiations when both parties have agreed on the ultimate objective that the fate of Kashmir shall depend upon the freely expressed will of the people.

"I would strongly urge therefore that you take the opportunity provided by the Colombo Conference to have a thorough discussion of the problem with both sides and use your influence to bring the Indians to a full realization of the necessity of continuing negotiations on a real give and take basis until a satisfactory solution is reached. I am seeing Mrs. Pandit[106] and Bajpai on Monday and shall emphasize this point to them."

The Embassy understands Mr. Acheson has sent a similar message to Mr. Bevin.

Following for Heeney from Pearson, Begins: United States Ambassador to Ceylon [Joseph C.] Satterthwaite also delivered to me copy of Acheson's message referred to in your telegram No. 4. I told him that I would take advantage of any suitable opportunity to discuss Kashmir with Nehru.

2. I had a short talk with Bevin about this matter. He had as you know received similar message. He, and more particularly Noel-Baker, are worried that any official discussion of this subject here might give the Indians excuse to say that negotiations are being transferred from Lake Success to Colombo and thereby add to the delay which some think the Indians are trying to prolong. I told Bevin I thought that a personal talk with Nehru need not involve this (danger?). Bevin will have such a talk but not until after Acheson has seen Bajpai in Washington and he has received a report on that talk. He is profoundly distressed about the Kashmir situation and much more pessimistic about developments than Noel-Baker. He is particularly worried about economic war between the two countries which seems to be taking place. His pessimism may be in part due to his fatigue and physical condition but he was very dubious about any intervention with Nehru having slightest effect.

3. Meanwhile, I read with interest your telegram No. 2. I think it is important to maintain position which you outline. McNaughton cannot continue any mediation work except on conditions mentioned. I will certainly stress that fact with Nehru when I discuss this matter with him. Ends.

KASHMIR

Following for Heeney from Pearson, Begins: I have not heard anything from United States Ambassador here regarding Acheson - Bajpai talk and I assume you have had nothing from Wrong. However, Mr. Bevin showed me yesterday a telegram reporting on this conversation which he had received from Franks. The report was very unsatisfactory in so far as bringing United States pressure to bear on India was concerned. Apparently Mr. Acheson merely listened to Bajpai.

2. This evening I spent an hour and a half alone with Nehru at his room in Government House nearly all the time discussing Kashmir. He was perfectly willing to talk and was in a very frank and friendly mood. He went over the whole history of the question as seen by him, adding a few details to those which we received from him in Ottawa. He feels McNaughton proposals as presented are even less acceptable than suggestions made by UNCIP and though he does not blame McNaughton in any way and respects him as a sincere and honest mediator he feels that it was too much to expect an agreed solution to this terribly complicated and passionately argued problem to be reached in ten days or two weeks. I pointed out to him that General McNaughton had acted merely as President of Security Council and now that he had vacated that position neither he nor Canada had any further special responsibility in the matter. I said that General McNaughton would not continue to act as mediator unless:

(1) The Security Council pressed him to do so and

(2) Unless India and Pakistan pressed him to do so and

(3) Unless there was some chance of a successful result.

After listening to Nehru I feel these conditions were not likely to be fulfilled and I told him so. In considering I feel pretty strongly that we should not accept any further responsibilities in the matter and that General McNaughton should be told this. I will inform the United Kingdom people here.

3. I pointed out to Nehru that it was now almost inevitable, I thought, that there would be a full dress discussion before the Security Council and that this would have unhappy results. He thought that this might now have to take place but he regretted it as, to use his own words, "there would be a lot of mud slinging." He thought that the only way such a debate could be avoided would be by appointment by Security Council of a mediator with general and comprehensive terms of reference who would go to Pakistan and India and try to mediate there on the spot with ample time to do so. He admitted that this had been tried by UNCIP without success but felt that a qualified individual might do better. He still proclaims fervently that the future of Kashmir can not, repeat not, be settled by arms or aggression and that people must decide by their own choice as to whether they wished to belong to Pakistan or India. He, of course, feels as strongly as ever about the initial moral guilt of Pakistan and has not, I think, given up hope that somehow in some way Kashmir may avoid becoming part of that country. I emphasized to him that meanwhile the situation seemed to be freezing and that India was losing in world opinion and prestige by recent developments. I did my best to emphasize deplorable character of present position. Nehru completely agreed with me but we did not get any further than that. Nehru made one remark which made me less disposed than I might otherwise have been to take a stronger line. He said Bajpai in his interview with Acheson made the suggestion that I mentioned above, that a mediator should be sent to India. Acheson did not turn it down or stand on the McNaughton proposal but, according to Nehru, indicated that there might be something in Bajpai's idea. If this is noncommittal line which United States is taking on this matter, while giving us the impression of bringing pressure to bear on India, I think that we should be very careful about not, repeat not, going too far either with India or with Pakistan. In any event, I do not think that I made much impression on Nehru tonight and possibly it was just as well after an hour or so that we switched subject to the nature of Communism, the wickedness of the Soviet and the estimable quality of the Canadian people. Ends.

Following for the Minister from Heeney, Begins: Your telegram No. 7, January 13, Kashmir.

2. When Acheson saw Bajpai and Mrs. Pandit on January 9th in Washington, Bajpai stated (according to the summary which we received from Wrong) "that the positions of the two parties to the dispute regarding the Azad Forces and the northern areas are irreconcilable, and that no further purpose could be served through further discussions with General McNaughton. He said that the question should now be considered by the Security Council and that the next step should be the appointment by the Security Council of a mediator who should go to the Sub-continent with broad terms of reference to settle the problem. These terms of reference should be broad enough to include as an eventual solution partition with a plebiscite limited to the vale of Kashmir. However, since the public on the Sub-continent is not yet ready for such a solution the idea would have to be developed gradually out of fairly protracted negotiations."

3. We have no information as to what reply Acheson made on that occasion.

4. Austin in New York formally presented Acheson's reply to Bajpai on January 13th. Wrong sent to us a summary of the operative parts of this reply and indicated that the United States Ambassador in Colombo was passing it on to you.

5. In order to ensure that you have the actual text of the operative part, I shall quote from telegram No. 35 of January 16th† from McNaughton which states that Austin used the following words on behalf of Acheson. Text begins:

"1. After careful consideration I have concluded serious deterioration Indo-Pakistan relations requires earlier visible progress toward Kashmir settlement than he envisages. Most reassuring move for people of subcontinent and for world opinion would be agreement on program for demilitarization Kashmir. Security Council appointment mediator without concomitant agreement demilitarization would contribute little or nothing to removing fears or lessening tension.

"2. I consider it essential that discussions with McNaughton be continued in New York until agreement reached. In my opinion proposals which McNaughton has put forward afford realistic approach to problem at this stage and practicable basis for further negotiation. According information available here, Indian reply these proposals contains nothing new and moves away from rather than toward settlement. From motives friendship and good will I urge reconsideration by Government of India.

"3. If McNaughton efforts fail owing Indian rejection will be third consecutive time India has refused accept finding impartial United Nations agent. Pakistan however accepted UNCIP arbitration recommendation and we understand has accepted proposals McNaughton has put forward. In these circumstances if India should terminate McNaughton's efforts, we would support in the Security Council his present proposals or such further proposals as he might put forward as a consequence of subsequent discussions with the parties and would in light his recommendations support Security Council action necessary to overcome present deadlock". Text ends.

6. In reply, Bajpai, whose attitude was very cool, merely asked whether Acheson's message might be construed as a threat. Austin assured him that it was "not a threat but simply a statement of fact."

7. My next succeeding telegram† gives the full text of the message sent by Nehru to Bajpai following receipt of Acheson message. It indicates that Nehru reacted strongly to United States pressure and stated that his Government does not consider that further negotiations at Lake Success, at this stage, are likely to lead to any fruitful result.

8. We learn that the next meeting of the Security Council which was to have taken place on Friday, January 20, will probably be postponed until the following week as United States authorities are anxious to allow Nehru time "to cool off", while at the same time working to induce him to modify his position.

9. General McNaughton is being informed in accordance with your instructions of your view that he should not continue in any mediatory role. At the Security Council meeting he intends to table the Indian and Pakistan replies and offer no comment. Ends.

Following for Mr. Pearson from Heeney, Begins: Persistent reports from United Kingdom sources have been reaching General McNaughton in New York and Canadian Embassy in Washington to the effect that you have agreed with Noel-Baker on course of action in regard to Kashmir. Suggestion is that full-dress debate on Kashmir take place immediately in Security Council on basis of McNaughton proposals, including strong statements by United Kingdom, United States and other delegations, as a result of which India might accept compromise formula to be discussed with mediator. In the expectations that these hopes will be fulfilled, McNaughton should be asked by Security Council to continue negotiations between two parties on the basis of his proposals. U.K. sources also suggest that, since events may be expected to develop in this manner, you and Noel-Baker agree that McNaughton can and will continue to act.

[107] Copie envoyée à New York le 26 janvier 1950, N° 60.
Repeated to New York on January 26, 1950 as No. 60.

2. We have informed McNaughton that we have not (repeat not) received any information from you that would confirm these reports. We are also proposing to tell him that, in the absence of further instructions, he should inform friendly delegations in New York that he has not (repeat not) been given any indication that Indian Government wishes him to continue to act or would regard it as helpful if he did so. He should add that he has not (repeat not) received any indication that attitude of either party has changed in a manner which would enable him to secure agreement between them on the basis of his proposals, nor indeed on any other basis. He should, therefore, request his friends in the Security Council not (repeat not) to propose that he continue with his role as mediator. If such a proposal is nevertheless made in the Security Council, he should state that, though as President of the Security Council he was glad to seek basis for agreement between parties, he regards his mandate as having terminated with his presidency, and that after careful examination of the circumstances, he does not consider that useful propose would be served by asking him to continue these functions.

3. Security Council is called for Wednesday, February 1. Unless we hear from you to the contrary, we will advise McNaughton to hold to the position as outlined in this telegram.

4. We understand that McNaughton still holds firmly to the view that his conditions should be fully met before he would agree to continue negotiations, and that he sees no evidence as yet that they will be met. Ends.

TELEGRAM 25 New Delhi, January 26, 1950

Following for Heeney from Chipman, Begins: Minister, who left yesterday for Rangoon, wishes me to tell you the following regarding Kashmir. At all interviews, both in Karachi and in New Delhi, Pearson stressed the tragic nature of continuing deadlock and its effects on economies and national interests of the two countries.

2. He found the feeling everywhere in Karachi very strong, though Prime Minister more reasonable than others, but general despair of any solution.

3. In New Delhi he found, contrary to view of Noel-Baker, that Patel, on whom we called on Monday, was even more rigid than Nehru whose expressions have been less stiff than expected. Bajpai, in interview to be mentioned below, also said this is so.

4. Patel strong on Pakistan aggression also on vast problem for India of new refugees, particularly from Jammu if Kashmir went entirely to Pakistan. On claim of Pakistan to represent Moslems, he commented that on racial basis there are more Moslems in India than in Pakistan. Minister of Health, otherwise mild, also uncompromising. Pearson found this attitude typical of people on this level. Governor General seemed very saddened by general outlook.

5. Tuesday evening we saw Bajpai who expressed view that there is no further hope in present United Nations negotiations. He mentioned his interview with Acheson when he (Bajpai) suggested mediation and he reminded Pearson of similar suggestion to him on train journey prior to Nehru's Ottawa visit. On present occasion Bajpai evidently had in mind mediation of type described by Nehru in paragraph three of Pearson's telegram No. 7 of January 13th to you. Pearson indicated he could not quite see just what such a mediator might accomplish; Bajpai on his part did not make clear just what issues mediator would be expected to resolve. It seemed obvious that he had in mind a mediation not so much to effect demilitarization preparatory to total vote, as rather to bring parties together on a fresh basis. At first he said he did not see how the Security Council could pass any useful resolution, but later seemed to suggest it might possibly ask each party to appoint a representative who with the other might choose a third with a view to seeing if a solution could be reached.

6. Bajpai said, though it cannot be stated aloud, no solution is possible along the lines of single Kashmir-wide plebiscite: Gilgit and Azad portions should go to Pakistan, Jammu to India, and plebiscite should be restricted to Vale of Kashmir.

7. Bajpai does not think religion is the only factor in Kashmir Valley. Other considerations cut across religious divisions.

8. The question of present suspension of negotiations at Lake Success came up. Pearson referred to suppositions that suspension was either because of Rau's desire to come back for 26th, or because hope that Pearson might explore possibility of bringing parties nearer agreement but Bajpai said Rau had not intended to come. Pearson then stated, if hopes referred to were reason, he did not wish to be looked to as a cause of further suspension of Council activity; and that while Canada does not wish to shirk responsibility, yet in present impasse he feels strongly that we should pull out with McNaughton, as conditions for his further action appear unfulfillable.

9. Bajpai had not yet seen Nehru but left to visit him.

10. In talking to Patel and Bajpai, and I think also to Nehru, Pearson took line with regard to McNaughton proposals that they were made by McNaughton in his capacity as President of the Security Council. At the same time he (Pearson) did not wish to criticize them in any way. Pearson made no particular comment on the observations reported in this telegram, except as specifically indicated.

11. Pearson thinks if someone on the Security Council does not suggest some such new approach as that outlined by Bajpai, India ultimately will.

12. Incidentally, final comment in paragraph 8 of your despatch No. 14 of January 10th† does not accord views we have got here in conversations with British or with Pearson's own view.

13. Nye[108] was informed of developments outlined above and I am informing the United States Ambassador.

14. My own impression is that no final solution lies in total vote. Whichever won the whole, an Alsace-Lorraine problem would remain and, apart from the minority problems in the territory in dispute, the minority in each of the losing countries would be exposed to tragic conditions.

Following for Mr. Pearson from Heeney, Begins: When our position on Kashmir as stated in our telegram delivered to you in Singapore and confirmed in your reply was communicated to United States officials in Washington and New York it produced a sharp reaction. Gross, Austin's alternate, said that Acheson's position vis-à-vis India would now be very difficult in view of the strong language used in his message to Nehru. He added that he felt compelled to say that "quite unwittingly, Mr. Pearson has placed the Secretary of State in an anomalous position". When reminded that State Department had known from the beginning of McNaughton's conditions, Gross said that State Department regarded third condition (reasonable prospect of success) as irrelevant, and implied that second condition (willingness of both parties to accept McNaughton) was equally irrelevant. He said he would advise Acheson to appeal to you on governmental level and added that they were considering asking McNaughton to continue in his private capacity.

2. Meanwhile we have received from State Department through Embassy in Washington request that we ask you to reconsider the position. State Department argues that present proposals in regard to McNaughton are new ones. The primary task would not be so much mediating between the two parties as assisting the Council as a whole in working out a resolution as a rapporteur. McNaughton would simply be acting on behalf of the Council as an agent to facilitate informal discussions of the issues among the members of the Council with a view to arriving at a consensus regarding the best course to be followed.

3. We have commented on this message from the State Department by saying that we were not impressed by the distinction drawn between a mediator and a rapporteur. Even if distinction is valid, we think that it overlooks the principal consideration as to whether or not the process is likely to produce any constructive results. We have, however, agreed to send this message to you at their urging. We have also commented to McNaughton and to Embassy in Washington that we see no foundation whatever for criticism of our position offered by Gross.

4. I have explained the situation in outline as it now stands to the Prime Minister. Mr. St. Laurent fully concurs in the position taken by you and General McNaughton and he is emphatic that the General should not repeat not be asked to undertake further responsibilities in regard to Kashmir except under conditions stated. Following for General McNaughton from Heeney, Begins: My immediately following teletype† contains text of message which I have sent to Minister in Tokyo, giving substance of representations made by State Department and communicated to us in telegram No. WA-216 of January 27† from Washington, which has been repeated to you. You will notice that we do not attach much importance to the distinction made by Matthews of the State Department between roles of mediator and rapporteur. Nor do we consider that this distinction, even if it is a valid one, affects the primary consideration as to whether or not the process is likely to produce constructive results.

2. In regard to the statements made by Gross and reported in your telegram No. 91 of January 27,† we cannot of course accept responsibility for any misapprehension the State Department may have been under concerning the Minister's views as a result of information received from sources other than ourselves. At no time has the Minister suggested to us that he had changed his views in regard to your conditions for continuing any responsibility as mediator. On the contrary, he has repeatedly confirmed them. We find it hard to understand, therefore, why Gross should say that "Mr. Pearson has placed the Secretary of State in an anomalous position". Moreover, whatever Gross and the State Department may have thought about the relevance of your conditions, there has never been any suggestion from a Canadian source that we were prepared to agree that they were irrelevant.

3. Gross's suggestion, referred to in paragraph 9 of your telegram, that the State Department was considering whether you might be able to continue to act on a purely personal basis and not as a Canadian representative, seems to imply that there is some difference of view between you and the Government on this question and that it is only your instructions which prevent you from agreeing with the course of action he suggests. I am sure that you have left Gross under no illusions on this score.

4. We hope that United States authorities will realize that our attitude is not determined by any reluctance to give further assistance, or to make your services available, if by doing so we could serve any useful purpose. Our attitude is determined simply by our belief that, failing acceptance of the conditions which you have set forth, no useful purpose can be served by continuing the discussions under your auspices.

5. This morning I explained the present situation in outline to the Prime Minister. Mr. St. Laurent fully concurs in the position which we have taken and is emphatically of the opinion that you should not (repeat not) be asked to undertake further responsibilities in regard to Kashmir except under the conditions stated.

6. In the circumstances we hope very much that no effort will be made in the Security Council to have your responsibilities continued. Ends.

1. When I was at his house yesterday evening Mr. Acheson spoke to me about Kashmir. He was obviously disappointed by our insistence that McNaughton should not continue his efforts to bring the parties to the dispute together unless our three conditions are met. He used phrase at the beginning which implied that the Canadian Government was evading its responsibilities, but he did not pursue this line at all when I denied this vigorously, incidentally placing the blame for any misunderstanding of our position on Noel-Baker's misleading reports to London from Karachi on Pearson's attitude. (Acheson has no high opinion of Noel-Baker and he seemed quite ready to accept this explanation.)

2. He said, using lawyer's language, that what he had in mind now was that something like a pre-trial hearing should be held, based on McNaughton's negotiations. The Security Council had adopted two resolutions on the dispute; one or both of the parties maintained that they could not now be applied; the purpose should now be to make it clear why they could not be applied, and, escaping from the procedural tangle, to seek to discover what could be put in their place. The immediate point, he said, is procedure to be adopted from here on. Was it possible for India and Pakistan to agree on the substance? If not, could they agree on a procedure designed to enable them to reach agreement on the substance? Would it be useful, for instance, to submit the issues about the application of the resolutions to the World Court? Was there any other way, through mediation or otherwise, with prospects of success?

3. He mentioned that Bajpai had been dropping about hints about the ultimate solution on the lines mentioned in Chipman's report of Pearson's conversations in New Delhi. (See paragraph 6 of New Delhi telegram No. 25 of January 26.) Acheson thinks that in fact this is what will come about, with the central issue limited to the future of the Vale of Kashmir, Jammu going to India and Gilgit and Azad areas to Pakistan. He said nothing, however, about limiting the plebiscite to the Vale of Kashmir as Bajpai desires.

4. I remarked that Gross had used some very forthright language about the Canadian attitude in his last talk with McNaughton in New York. He answered that he knew nothing of this, although he had been reading Gross's report of this conversation.

5. Finally, he said that he was being urged to raise the issue directly with Mr. Pearson. I said that Mr. Pearson would not be back for nearly a fortnight. He then said that he might wish to go into it more fully with me.

6. Acheson's concern is to find some way out of the impasse which has a fair prospect of success. He is impatient over the subtleties and procedural arguments which now obscure the issues. He thinks that continued participation of McNaughton in the negotiations would provide a good chance of bringing the issues into the open, although we were interrupted before he went into this in any detail. I told him that I would, of course, bring his views to your notice, but that I greatly doubted that McNaughton's instructions would be changed. It was at that point that he said he might want to go into the matter more fully with me.

From Pearson, Begins: Your telegram to me of January 28th — Kashmir position.

Do not know why our position should have produced any United States "sharp reaction" unless that it has been misrepresented at Lake Success because of messages received from London. That position is clear but I do not see why it should embarrass the U.S.A. in any action which they may wish to take at the Security Council or with India. The first two conditions we laid down for McNaughton continuing as a mediator seem to me to be eminently reasonable. Third is, of course, not so important if first two are accepted. If U.S.A. or United Kingdom wish to push ahead with a Security Council resolution for pursuing mediation on basis of McNaughton proposals, there is nothing to prevent them and they could use Nimitz[109] or Bunche or someone appropriate as Mediator if McNaughton not available. I had thought myself, on arrival at Colombo, that this was the best course to follow in order to prevent the break which would result from a Security Council resolution which India would not accept and I talked, as you know, to Bevin and Nehru along these lines, though leaving McNaughton out of it. But as a result of discussions in Karachi and New Delhi I became convinced that this kind of Security Council action would not now lead to useful results. After my visit to New Delhi, seemed to me that the best chance of agreement now was direct negotiation between the two parties on highest level. Possibly the Security Council resolution could recommend that, but I have made no such suggestion to anyone. Bajpai, whom I saw on his return, thinks now that this is the best course of action, but I do not know about Liaquat. I found him and his colleagues at Karachi determined not to make a single additional concession to Indian point of view. At New Delhi, contrary to Noel-Baker's advice to me, I found all of the Ministers I spoke to, especially Patel, lined up solidly behind Nehru position. Feeling on both sides is bitter beyond my expectations and situation is dangerous and explosive. I do not think, however, though others may disagree, that a resolution of the Security Council pinning responsibility on India, however justified it may be, will now help very much. If the two Prime Ministers could meet, appoint their own representatives to seek an agreement, and these should choose a third as neutral chairman, this might be the course. But it certainly is not our special responsibility any longer to advance solutions. Jessup has been sending me messages the last ten days suggesting a meeting but I was unable to arrange this — and now feel rather relieved that I could not. However, left with Malcolm MacDonald full account of my visit to Karachi and New Delhi which he is going to pass on to Jessup for information. Also seeing Butterworth[110] here tomorrow and will tell him that I do not understand why the State Department people in Lake Success should have reacted as they did. I am getting a little impatient with the Americans blowing hot and cold on this Kashmir business.

Having a very busy time Tokyo. Very interesting hour and lunch afterwards with MacArthur yesterday, whom I shall see again tomorrow evening. Bag arrived today. Thanks very much. Ends.

1. At my request Cadogan[111] and Curson[112] called this afternoon at my office. Arnold Smith and Carter were with me. I told Cadogan that I was inclining toward the view that I should report to the President of the Security Council in writing, and return to Ottawa this weekend, rather than report orally and sit at the Council table on Tuesday. I told him that the recent further postponement of the Council meeting was slightly inconvenient, though this was not the important factor; and that my principal reason was that I felt it might be preferable for the Council members and parties to be free to discuss the situation without any sense of inhibition due to my presence at the table.

2. I am anxious to avoid any danger that the Canadian Government or I should be charged with responsibility for a breakdown of Kashmir negotiations due to my leaving New York before these negotiations are concluded; and I therefore told Cadogan that I felt you would probably wish me to return to New York if the three conditions, to which I have adhered since the latter part of December, should in fact be met. I mentioned that, while I had other work in Ottawa, I felt that you would give a high priority to the Kashmir question, if in fact these conditions were met and if my return here would, therefore, serve a really useful purpose.

3. Cadogan expressed full understanding of my position and the procedure I propose to follow in reporting to the Council.

It has been decided that General McNaughton should not report in person in the meeting of the Security Council scheduled for tomorrow to consider the Kashmir question. He has however despatched a letter† to the President of the Council describing his activities since the last Council meeting on Kashmir on December 29. As you know since the termination of his mandate as Council President on December 31, McNaughton has merely served as a channel of communication between the two disputant governments and his letter in the main merely gives a detailed description of his work in this regard. It also states however that in the absence of evidence that his continued mediation would seem likely to assist India and Pakistan toward an agreed course of action, he does not believe that further activity on his part would serve any useful purpose. As regards his own view, General McNaughton's letter states that he has nothing to add to the proposals submitted to the two parties on December 22.

2. As you may have heard the United Kingdom representative in Tokyo was asked on January 31 to pass a personal message to Pearson from Noel-Baker urging Minister to agree to allow McNaughton to assist Council until debate on Kashmir was concluded. United States delegation in New York has been anxious that McNaughton's report should underline importance of immediate demilitarization of Jammu and Kashmir.[113]

3. It is anticipated that McNaughton will have left New York when the debate takes place tomorrow. Ends.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Washington, February 20, 1950

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

You told me when we met last week that you would like to find out whether Dean Acheson was annoyed over our refusal to allow McNaughton to continue his activities in the Kashmir dispute unless certain conditions were met. I have not had a chance to speak to him since I got back, but I have spoken to both Dean Rusk and Jack Hickerson. Dean Rusk said that I could tell you on behalf both of himself and of the Secretary of State that no annoyance was engendered. Hickerson confessed to a little mild personal irritation himself, but added that this was not to be taken at all seriously.

I have a feeling from the way Dean Rusk spoke that the State Department may, if an opportunity arises, seek to secure the appointment of a Canadian as mediator. He said that one of the difficulties they were encountering was that both India and Pakistan introduced into discussions of the matter with the United States a mild sort of blackmail by bringing into the discussions questions affecting the relationship between the U.S. and Russia. He thought that Canada would be fairly immune to such a tactic. I told him that the Canadian Government was certainly not anxious to undertake any fresh responsibilities in the Kashmir issue, that McNaughton had done his best to further a solution, and that you had recently endeavoured to influence both India and Pakistan during your visits to Karachi and New Delhi. I said that you thought that there was little chance of either side yielding points to the other and had remarked to me that the only hope that you could see at present would be to bring together, if possible, Nehru and Liaquat for direct negotiations.

Hickerson has told me that they are working on some ideas in the State Department for a further discussion in the Security Council, and said that he would get an officer of his Department to inform Ignatieff of what they had in mind. This was four or five days ago and Ignatieff has not been approached. I have told him not to take an initiative in inquiring at the State Department, as this might be interpreted as evidence that the Canadian Government was not averse to playing some further part at this stage.

Yours ever,

CONFIDENTIAL Geneva, June 12, 1950

Dear Sir,

The Allocations Committee of the Governing Body of the International Labour Organization met recently to discuss among other things an appropriate scale for the allocation of the expenses of the Organization among states members. You will recall that difficulties have been caused by the United States monetary ceiling on the amount of its contribution.

As legislative action has not yet been completed in the United States to raise the ceiling, it was not possible for the Committee to make progress towards the preparation of a permanent scale. However, the United States delegate said that his delegation would not vote against a scale for 1951 which set the United States contribution for 1951 at 25%. The United States contribution for 1950 was 22%.

It was agreed by the Committee whose report was subsequently adopted by the Governing Body that for the year 1951 a scale would be recommended on the basis of a 25% contribution for the United States and the Secretariat submitted a paper setting out four possible scales on this basis. These scales will be submitted to the Finance Committee of the I.L.O. Conference along with a further scale suggested by Australia which is based on the United Nations 1950 scale with a maximum contribution of 25%, a minimum contribution of 12% with no state paying a higher percentage than in 1950.

I am attaching two copies† of the five scales listed as AA., AA.1, BB, CC and CC.1 which will be considered by the Finance Committee of the Conference.

As Mr. Sidney Pollock of the Department of Finance is at present in Florence attending the UNESCO Conference, I forwarded the proposed scales to him and requested his comments. I am attaching a copy of Mr. Pollock's reply dated June 9th and you will note that he has suggested that the Canadian delegation might support the adoption of scale CC or any other scale submitted to the Conference which would have the effect of reducing the Canadian contribution below its 1950 level.

Unless other instructions are received from you, I shall follow the suggestions made by Mr. Pollock when this matter is discussed by the Conference.

Yours sincerely,

Delegation, Fifth General Conference of UNESCO, to Secretary, Permanent Delegation to European Office of United Nations

Florence, June 9, 1950

Dear Norman [Berlis],

I have your letter of June 6† requesting my comments on the suggested scales of contributions which are to be submitted to the Finance Committee of the I.L.O. Conference. As you know, I have not had much time to examine the scales and my preliminary remarks that follow are, of course, subject to any change which may be notified to you direct from Ottawa.

Generally speaking, it would seem to be desirable to press for adoption of that scale which would lead to the minimum contribution for Canada for 1951. It is not hard to justify such an approach. Our contribution to the I.L.O. has always been out of line with our relative "capacity to pay", especially as compared with the assessment of the United States and, to a lesser extent, the United Kingdom. Furthermore, on a per capita basis, our contribution is considerably higher than that of the United States. Since I assume that it will not be possible this year to raise the United States' contribution above the 25% figure mentioned in your letter, I doubt that there is much that you can do to bring our contribution down this year. Nevertheless, as already indicated above, our aim should be to bring the United States contribution up and others like Canada down correspondingly.

There is, however, one qualification I should make: it seems highly unrealistic to increase the contribution of China for 1951. If, as I suspect, the Chinese are already substantially in arrears in the I.L.O., the effect of an increase in their contribution for 1951 would be to increase these arrears and to bring serious financial consequences for the Organization. In the circumstances, I would feel that scale A.A., in which the Chinese contribution would be increased to 7.64% should not be supported for 1951. If and when the Chinese issue is finally resolved, it may be appropriate to re-assess China at a rate appropriate to its capacity to pay and to its national importance. However, at the moment I would be inclined to follow the line of expediency in this connection.

If we exclude scale A.A. and examine the other proposed scales, it will be noted that the only scale which does not lead to an increase during 1950 in the Canadian contribution is scale C.C. Accordingly, my tentative recommendation would be to support the adoption of scale C.C., or any other scale submitted to the Conference which would have the effect of reducing the Canadian contribution below its 1950 level. I would also suggest that the Canadian Delegation might indicate that, while the United States increase is a step in the right direction, further adjustments will be required in future if the scales are to be true to the criteria of "capacity to pay".

I am rushing out this hastily dictated note as I feel that you are anxious to receive my views on this question. If I have a further opportunity tonight, I may be able to write again and at greater length.

Best personal regards,

Yours sincerely,
SID POLLOCK

My letter of June 12th, scale of I.L.O. contributions for 1951.

1. Finance Committee of Conference reached impasse when those States which received reduced percentage under scale A.A.1. supported that scale and others, including Canada, who would have to pay more under A.A.1. supported C.C. or C.C.1. Sub-Committee has now been established to seek compromise and Berlis as Vice-Chairman of Finance Committee is a member of the Sub-Committee.

2. France is pressing vigorously for A.A.1. as being closest to the United Nations scale, but they have agreed to pay as high as 9 per cent. United Kingdom is opposed to A.A.1. but has agreed to pay 13.6 per cent. The Secretariat has been asked by the Sub-Committee to approach other countries to ascertain whether they will make concessions.

3. It has been stated in the Committee that Canada does not, repeat not, favour any scale which would increase her percentage contribution above that of 1950. This position will be maintained in the absence of other instructions, but in view of request for concessions advice by telegram would be appreciated.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

Your telegrams Nos. 93 and 94† of the 16th and 19th of June: Scale of I.L.O. contributions for 1951.

We have consulted with Finance on the problem raised in your telegrams under reference. It is their view, in which we concur, that you should resist any attempt to have adopted a scale which would increase our contribution for 1951. In the meetings of the Sub-Committee and of the Finance Committee you should therefore continue to support scales C.C. or C.C.1.

2. You should also point out the following objections to scale A.A.1:

(a) The inequities in the 1950 scale, due to the fact that it does not satisfactorily reflect capacity to pay, would be aggravated;

(b) While it would bring France and some other countries closer to the United Nations scale, it would, at the same time, drive Canada, the United Kingdom, Sweden and other countries further away from it;

(c) It would impose a heavier burden on a number of small countries.

3. You might also tactfully deflate the importance of France's concession to accept an assessment of 9% by pointing out that this would represent less than its contribution for 1950 and less than it would contribute in 1951 under scale C.C. or C.C.1.

4. Even if you find that there is widespread support, either in the Sub-Committee or in the Finance Committee itself, for a compromise, which would involve an allocation for Canada of 4.28% you should maintain your position and inform us by telegram at once. We will then consider the question further with the Department of Finance in order to frame instructions as to how you should handle this question in the Plenary.

Reference your telegram No. 90. Scale of contributions to I.L.O.

1. All arguments suggested have been used in Finance Committee and Sub-Committee. However, AAI has been taken as basis for 1951 because more countries will improve their positions under that scale than any other. New scale based on AAI has been prepared after negotiations with various countries and has now been accepted by Sub-Committee and Finance Committee.

2. Under new scale Sweden has agreed to pay 2.33 per cent which is the same as 1949. United Kingdom has agreed to pay 13.60 per cent which is higher than 1949 or 1950. France will pay 8.88 per cent. Scale AAI provides for 4.36 per cent from Canada but following Canadian protest this has been reduced to 4.28 per cent in new scale.

3. I argued against the assessment for Canada in Sub-Committee but received no, repeat no, support. Dalton of United Kingdom referred specifically to my interventions and said United Kingdom had accepted their assessment in order to reach agreement but United Kingdom would not, repeat not, accept increase if other countries (obviously referring to Canada) did not, repeat not, show a similar spirit of compromise.

4. In both Sub-Committee and Finance Committee I registered abstention with respect to Canadian allocation. Finance Committee also approved draft resolution for submission to Conference covering expenditure budget and income budget for 1951. I voted for Resolution but registered abstention with respect to Canadian assessment.

5. Resolution referred to, paragraph four, will probably come before Conference on Monday, June 26th. As it appears unlikely that smaller assessment for Canada can now be obtained, it is suggested Canada might support Resolution in plenary without reservation. Would appreciate instructions.

6. It is understood, of course, that new scale is only, repeat only, for 1951 and another attempt will be made next year to prepare more permanent and more equitable scale.

Ottawa, February 28, 1950

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE FIFTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL COUNCIL OF THE INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION AND TO THE SEVENTH SESSION OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF IRO COMMENCING ON MARCH 8, 1950

The Provisional Agendas for the Fifth Session of the General Council and of the Seventh Session of the Executive Committee are attached as Annex 1.† Items 7 and 12 of the former agenda are considered the principal points which will arise at the meetings, and commentaries on them follow:

The Problem of Residual Cases

2. Item 7 of the Provisional Agenda of the Fifth Session of the General Council of IRO relates to refugees who are considered permanently unfit for resettlement on account of age, disability, disease or other causes. In the middle of 1949 it was estimated that there might be as many as 175,000 members of this category still residing in IRO camps in Germany, Austria, the Levant, East Africa and the Philippines. As IRO ceased to accept further refugees in its camps after October, 1949, the number of residual or 'hard-core' cases has doubtless declined considerably because many countries, including Canada, have allowed some of them to come forward as close relatives or as destined to particularly favourable settlement arrangements.

3. The Canadian Delegation should insist that IRO continue to assume responsibility for the 'hard-core' cases until the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees is prepared to take over the task.

4. However, at the same time the importance of reducing expenditures of IRO to a minimum should be stressed: the maximum possible number of residual cases, as of D.P.'s in general, should be settled in permanent homes. In this regard Canada should continue to support the efforts made by IRO to negotiate with local authorities, voluntary agencies and interested Governments, for the permanent care of particular categories of 'hard-core' persons (e.g. the Scandinavian countries' acceptance of chronic T.B. cases who will live in village settlements).

5. The Delegation should also press for the practising of every possible economy by IRO in its administration so that costs of care and maintenance of D.P.'s are reduced to a minimum. In this regard it is considered essential that the expenses visualized in the plan of expenditure for the period 1950/51 should not be exceeded.

Plan of Expenditure for the Supplementary Period

6. The Plan of Expenditure for the supplementary period July 1, 1950—March 31, 1951 was approved in principle by the Fourth Session of the General Council in October, 1949. However, as noted in IRO document G.C./135, para. 41, "the Council considered the Director-General's budget submission to be a statement of the amounts he estimated to be necessary to effect a substantial resolution of the problem which the Organization had been set up to solve and reserved its right to examine the details of allocations between the various items of expenditure when the Plan of Expenditure would be placed before it at its next Session."

7. Particular items in the Plan of Expenditure should therefore be examined carefully to ensure that the best use is made by IRO of all the resources available. This is closely linked with the need to deal with the problem of residual cases by keeping costs of care and maintenance to a minimum: every precaution should be taken to ensure that the expenses foreseen in the Plan of Expenditure are not exceeded.

8. If the budget plan of expenditure remains at the level anticipated last October ($55,165,446 U.S.), on the question of devaluation of currencies the Delegation should support the position that where countries arrange to pay their assessments in local currencies — rather than in U.S. funds, the payment ought to be made at post-devaluation rates. For those countries which have devaluated since September, 1949, this position would involve the payment of a larger sum in local currencies than before September.

9. During the visit of Sir Arthur Rucker to Ottawa in February, it was proposed that the Canadian Government pay its 1949/50 contribution in the proportion of two million dollars in Canadian currency and the balance ($3,396,117) in U.S. dollars. The question of the form of Canada's contribution — assessed at $1,916,287 U.S. — for the Supplementary Period was left over for negotiation at a later date. The Minister of Finance has since indicated that Canada's contribution to the IRO for the year 1949-50 will in fact be comprised of three million Canadian dollars and the balance ($2,396,117) in U.S. funds from Canada's limited gold and dollar reserves. The Minister declined to accept the earlier tentative arrangement which had been discussed with Sir Arthur Rucker — 2 million Canadian dollars and the balance, $3,396,117, in U.S. funds — on the grounds that Canada would not be justified in reducing its gold and dollar reserves by this proportion under the circumstances described by the IRO. It has been decided to leave open for negotiation the form of Canada's contribution for the Supplementary Period but it should be understood that it will be wholly in Canadian dollars.

Volksdeutsche and Political Refugees

10. It is possible that a question may be raised concerning the desirability of bringing within IRO's mandate (a) Volksdeutsche and (b) political refugees from "iron curtain" countries.

11. With regard to the Volksdeutsche it is estimated that there may be as many as two million in Western Germany. However, it has been found extremely difficult in practice to distinguish between Volksdeutsche and the refugees from former German territory east of the Oder-Neisse line and the Soviet zone. We might take the position therefore that the Volksdeutsche are likely to be absorbed more satisfactorily in Western Germany than in any other country.

12. The continuing stream of refugees from behind the "iron curtain" presents an even greater problem since the IRO camps in Europe admitted no further refugees after October, 1949. If consideration is given to the matter it would seem preferable not to extend IRO's responsibilities to cover what is evidently a continuing problem. It might be suggested that the problem be left in abeyance until the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has taken office at the end of the year. Provision can then be made by the United Nations to deal with "iron curtain" refugees on a continuing basis.

13. The remaining items on the agenda appear to be clear-cut and do not call for special comment or instructions. However, if any subject is discussed on which the Delegation desires guidance, reference may be made to the Department by telegram.

Geneva, March 23, 1950

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of your letter of March 10† regarding the payment of the Canadian contributions to IRO for 1949/1950 and the supplementary period.

As your Excellency will be aware, the Canadian contributions for the two periods in question are expressed in document GC/147 as contributions to be paid in U.S. dollars or in such other currencies as may be agreed. The General Council of IRO have, during their present Session, taken document GC/147 into consideration and have directed me, in Resolution No. 60 in accordance with their usual practice, to accept payments against contributions due to IRO in the form and at the rates to be agreed, subject to the approval of the General Council at its next session. It will accordingly be necessary for me to seek to reach agreement with all Member Governments as to the currencies in which their outstanding contributions are to be paid and to report the agreements so reached to the General Council at its next session.

I fully appreciate the seriousness of the currency problems which the Government of Canada has to face and I am most anxious to arrive at an agreement which will be satisfactory to your Government and will at the same time assist IRO to complete its programme.

I must confess in all frankness to your Excellency that the proposal that approximately $3,200,000 out of the total contributions of $5,500,000 for 1949/1950 and the whole of the contributions for the supplementary period should be paid in Canadian dollars is a disappointment to me. I had hoped that your Government might have found it possible to approve the arrangement discussed with Sir Arthur Rucker for the 1949/1950 contribution and might have been prepared to leave for later determination, when the precise financial position of IRO will be more clearly known, the question of the contribution for the supplementary period.

I need hardly say that IRO will be happy to receive in respect of the Canadian contributions as large a sum in Canadian dollars as we are able to use in the implementation of our programme. I am, however, apprehensive that if the proposals made in your letter under reply were now accepted by me on behalf of the General Council, we might find it impossible to employ the full amount of Canadian dollars contributed and that we should consequently be unable to complete the work of IRO, since it is evident that the total resources likely to be available are the bare minimum of what will be required for the completion of our task.

I would, therefore, venture to urge that the method of payment indicated in your letter should not yet be regarded as final and that before the next session of the General Council, at which a report will need to be made under the terms of Resolution No. 60, there should be further discussions between us with a view to examining, in particular, all possible means of employing Canadian dollars in furtherance of our programmes. If this would be acceptable to your Excellency, I shall be happy to arrange for appropriate officers of IRO to enter into discussions with your officers in Ottawa.

If, in the meantime, the Government of Canada wish to arrange for the payment of their contribution for 1949/1950 to be made on the basis proposed in your letter, I shall be happy to accept the payment without prejudice to the results of the further discussions I have suggested.

On a minor though important point, I should like to express my gratitude for the recognition in your letter of the principle that such parts of the Canadian contributions as relate to the post-devaluation period and are paid in Canadian dollars will be paid at the devalued rate of exchange. This principle has now been accepted by all the other Governments concerned and its acceptance by the Government of Canada is thus most welcome. I have, however, found difficulty in understanding the exact basis on which the figures quoted in your letter have been calculated and I enclose a memorandum† showing the figures, as calculated by my officers, which differ slightly from those given in your letter.

In conclusion, I should like to say that I am deeply aware of the immense value of the support which the Government of Canada has given to IRO throughout its existence. If I appear now to be asking for still further support it is only because I know that it is the desire of Canada that her contributions to IRO shall be fully used to carry through the humanitarian task upon which we are together engaged.

I have, etc.,

J. DONALD KINGSLEY

Le sous-secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures au sous-ministre des Finances

Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of Finance

SECRET Ottawa, March 27, 1950

Dear Dr. Clark:

You will recall that at the last meeting of the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy, on Tuesday March 21, the possibility of selling some Newfoundland salted codfish to IRO out of the Canadian contribution of (Can.) $3 million was considered and it was agreed that the Department of External Affairs should examine further the Canadian contribution to IRO and ascertain the possibility of having part of it used for purchase of dried codfish.

From the Division of this Department that deals with IRO, I learned that the fullest possible exploration of this matter has already taken place in relation with Sir Arthur Rucker's visit last February. At that time, Sir Arthur appeared to have convinced the Canadian officials concerned that there was practically no way for IRO of using Canadian dollars for their purchases either abroad or in Canada.

However, when it was made known that salted codfish was available in Newfoundland, this Department instructed its delegate to the United Nations European headquarters to approach IRO with a view to having them buy some of this fish out of Canadian dollars. Unfortunately, the reply came to the effect that there was no possibility of making such an arrangement because IRO was drastically reducing its care and maintenance program. The two attached telegrams refer.†

I understand that Mr. Deutsch and Mr. Perry of your Department were both in on the discussions with Sir Arthur Rucker and may probably be in a position to provide you with additional information, should you need it.

Yours sincerely,

SECRET Ottawa, March 30, 1950

Dear Mr. Plumptre:

I have just received your letter dated March 27th in which you refer to the advice you have received that it will not be possible to use any of the Canadian dollar contribution to IRO for the purchase of dried codfish.

I think this is rather unfortunate. Messrs. Deutsch and Perry, of course, made me acquainted with the results of the discussions with Sir Arthur Rucker when he visited Ottawa last February. These results were discussed with the Minister before the decision was made that $3 million of our current year's contribution to IRO was to be made in Canadian dollars and only the remainder in United States dollars. It is, we feel, extraordinary and unjust that we should be required to pay out even this proportion of our contribution in United States dollars.

It seemed to the Minister that when IRO was given to understand that they were going to have $3 million (Canadian) available this year, they might find that a profitable use of these dollars was to buy codfish.[1]

Yours very truly,

DESPATCH 130 Athens, April 5, 1950

Sir:

With reference to my despatch No. 127 of March 30† on the meetings of the I.R.O. Executive Committee and General Council, I have the honour to report that Mr. Cormier of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and I had an informal talk on March 21 with the Director General of I.R.O. and his Deputy with regard to the possibility of Canada's accepting some of the "hard core" T.B. cases.

---

[1] La note suivante était jointe au document:/The following note was attached to this document:
Mr. Cleveland, Have you any comments[?] Do you think that we should go back at Clark with a fuller explanation of the I.R.O.'s position? I rather think we should. A.F.W. P[lumptre].

2. Briefly the Director General's suggestion is that Canada might be willing to accept a limited number of these cases if the I.R.O. were able to offer a sufficiently substantial grant to enable additional accommodation to be provided in institutions having the necessary "overhead" equipment, theatres, X-Ray and laboratory facilities, etc.

3. Sir Arthur Rucker, the Deputy Director General, has in mind also that the extra cost, such as maintenance and care, might be met by voluntary gifts from churches and charitable organizations. With this object in view, if you are inclined to take a favourable view of this scheme, Sir Arthur would propose to send a representative to Canada to see if sufficient support could be obtained from non-governmental sources. If such assistance is likely to be realized, he suggested that an effort might then be made to secure the approval of the provincial governments in whose jurisdiction the patients would probably be accommodated.

4. Though he was doubtful of the I.R.O.'s ability to determine at this stage what funds would be available, I have reason to believe that Mr. Kingsley, the Director General, when at first discussing this scheme was thinking of an amount of over $2,000,000 for the construction of a completely new hospital rather than the extension of existing facilities. Estimates which he had obtained showed that a new building with separate and complete equipment would cost in the neighbourhood of $10,000 a bed.

5. I am enclosing with this despatch a copy of part of a memorandum which Sir Arthur Rucker left with me after this talk. It will be seen that he is fully aware of the barrier presented by the present Canadian immigration laws but believes that sick persons may be admitted under certain provisions covering the cure and care of sick persons. His reference here is to Section 36 of the Immigration Act.

6. Neither Mr. Kingsley nor Sir Arthur was encouraged to hope that this scheme would receive your approval. It was agreed, however, that I should make preliminary soundings and, if you thought favourably of the plan or had any modifications to suggest, that I would communicate further with Sir Arthur after receiving your reply.

I have, etc.,

Extrait d'une note du directeur général suppléant de l'Organisation internationale pour les réfugiés

Extract from Memorandum by Deputy Director General, International Refugee Organization

[Geneva], March 21, 1950

If, with the assistance of any other funds that can be raised by voluntary gift, the costs can be met, we think that a scheme might be acceptable to Canada on the following grounds:

(1) Canada would thus make a noteworthy contribution to the solution of the "hard core" problem;

(2) The geography and climate of Canada are such that T.B. cases could be accepted without risk to public health;

(3) Canada is not so desperately short of hospital accommodation as are some countries. It should therefore be possible to find "base" hospitals to which new accommodation could be added;

(4) The addition of this new accommodation would, however, be an asset to Canada who, with the expectation of a growing population, would presumably be glad to see some enlargement of her hospital provision;

(5) Such a scheme as is proposed would help to solve — perhaps completely solve — the problem of how to use the Canadian dollars in which she wishes to pay part of her 1949-1950 contribution and the whole of her contribution for the supplementary period.

It may be said that Canada cannot under her immigration laws permit the entry of T.B. cases. That would be so if normal immigration were contemplated. There is, however, a provision of Canadian law which permits entry into Canada of sick persons for cure and care. It is thought that this provision would cover what is proposed.

A further question arises as to the actual implementation of a scheme for admitting T.B.s. The administration of the scheme would presumably need to be in the hands of Voluntary Bodies and Provincial Governments. In Quebec, for example, it is possible that Catholic Organizations might be willing to play a leading part. In other parts of Canada, it would probably be necessary to persuade the Provincial Government to implement a scheme.

What, then, is in mind is first to ascertain whether, if concrete schemes could be worked out, the Federal Government would be prepared to approve them and, then, if the Federal Government agree, to make approaches to Church and Voluntary Organizations and Provincial Governments and discuss actual schemes.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au directeur général de l'Organisation internationale pour les réfugiés

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Director General, International Refugee Organization

Ottawa, May 20, 1950

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge your letter of March 23 in connection with the payment of Canadian contributions to the International Refugee Organization for the fiscal period July 1, 1949 - June 30, 1950.

2. After careful consideration, the Canadian Government has found it possible to make available an amount of $2,396,117.00 in currency of the United States of America, with the balance payable in Canadian dollars. On April 25, 1950, a cheque for $3,190,815.40 in Canadian funds was deposited to the credit of the Organization in the Royal Bank of Canada, Montreal, and on the same date, a cheque for $2,396,117.00 in funds of the United States of America was sent to the First National Bank in New York City for deposit to the Organization's account, in full payment of Canada's contribution for 1949/50 to the International Refugee Organization.

3. I welcome the suggestion made in paragraph six of your letter that there should be further discussions with a view to examining all possible means of employing Canadian dollars in furtherance of IRO programmes. Mr. Allard has informed me that it is possible you may be able to visit Ottawa in early July. May I say that I look forward to the pleasure of your visit and shall ensure that opportunity is afforded to discuss this matter with all the officials concerned.

4. With reference to paragraph eight of your letter, it was agreed in the conversations with Sir Arthur Rucker during February, 1950, that the Canadian contribution for the first 81 days of the Organization's 1949/50 fiscal year, i.e., July 1 to September 19 inclusive, would be calculated at the pre-devaluation rate of exchange; and the balance at the current rate of exchange. Therefore, the proportion amounting to 81/365ths of the total annual contribution ($5,396,117) would not be subject to devaluation. This amount ($1,197,494) was subtracted from the $3,000,000 payable in Canadian funds, and to the remaining amount ($1,802,506) exchange of 10% was added, making a total amount of $1,982,757.

5. The Canadian contribution for 1949/50 is therefore calculated as follows:

Original assessment for 1949-50 (U.S. equivalents)	Method for Payment
$2,396,117.00 (U.S.)	= 2,396,117 U.S. dollars
1,197,494.00 (U.S.) at pre-devaluation rate of exchange	= 1,197,494 Canadian dollars
1,802,506.00 (U.S.) at current rate of exchange	= 1,982,757 Canadian dollars
$5,396,117.00 (U.S.)	($2,396,117 U.S. dollars ($3,180,251 Canadian dollars

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, July 6, 1950

Mr. Kingsley and Mr. Allard of I.R.O. called to see me this morning. It was a courtesy visit, but during our talk they brought up two matters which I should pass on to you.

The first concerned the possibility of I.R.O. assisting in the repatriation of refugees from iron curtain countries. The present mandate of I.R.O. does not cover these people, so far as resettlement is concerned, but Mr. Kingsley feels, and it is hard to disagree with him, that they should be looked after. Most of them, by the fact of their flight from their home countries, have given sufficient evidence of their quality, though of course there is always the danger that a few spies may have infiltrated among them. Mr. Kingsley said that he was thinking of taking this matter up with Government, but wished to mention it to me now informally. At the present time there are about fifteen thousand in the above group, but it is increasing. I told him that if a proposal was made that the I.R.O. should look after these people, we would certainly give it sympathetic consideration.

The other point concerned the extension of diplomatic immunity and privileges to the I.R.O. senior staff here, as members of a Specialized Agency of the United Nations.[2] I told Mr. Kingsley that we were at the moment trying to work out arrangements to this end with I.C.A.O. and that other United Nations officers would of course receive the benefit of any action we took in regard to I.C.A.O.[3] I would not be surprised if Mr. Allard has some interest in this matter!

Note de la Direction des Nations Unies

Memorandum by United Nations Division

[Ottawa], August 3, 1950

SUMMARY OF CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL OF THE INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION AND REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ON JULY 5 AND 7, 1950; AND PRESENT POSITION OF THE SUBJECTS RAISED

On July 6, 1950, Mr. J. Donald Kingsley met with representatives of the several departments concerned with I.R.O. problems and suggested that Canada accept 1,000 of I.R.O.'s 4,000 TB cases. He pointed out that I.R.O. would make a reasonable per capita grant to apply against the estimated costs of such a commitment; in fact the grant would be drawn from the Canadian dollar contribution to I.R.O. for 1949/50 and 1950/51. The proposal is presently being considered by the Departments of Citizenship and Immigration, and National Health and Welfare. It is understood that Mr. Allard will broach the subject to provincial Governments and voluntary welfare agencies if general approval is received from the federal government.

2. On July 7, 1950, Mr. Kingsley sought to persuade representatives of the Department of Finance to reconsider the decision by which approximately $3.3 million of the 1949/50 contribution and the entire $2.1 million of the 1950/51 contribution was paid in Canadian dollars, a total of more than $5,400,000.00 (Can.). On the ground that I.R.O. could not use that amount of Canadian funds, Mr. Kingsley wished to have as much as possible converted into U.S.A. funds. The Department of Finance is still firmly opposed to the conversion of any part of this amount.

3. In discussion with officials of the Department of Finance, Mr. Kingsley intimated that I.R.O. might be able to use additional amounts of French francs and Italian lire. He undertook to obtain confirmation on his return to Geneva. To date no confirmation has been received.

4. Mr. Kingsley also solicited the support of the Canadian Government for extending the mandate of I.R.O. to include escapees from behind the Iron Curtain. He was told that a formal proposal to this effect would receive sympathetic consideration.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures pour le sous-ministre des Finances

Memorandum from Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of Finance

Ottawa, September 18, 1950

The Chief of the I.R.O. Mission in Canada, Mr. Allard, has received an urgent message from I.R.O. headquarters in Geneva, a copy of which is enclosed,† asking him to obtain the necessary authority from Canada to convert 1,100,000 Canadian dollars into Italian lire. You will note from the message that Sir Arthur Rucker is at present in Rome negotiating with the Italian Government for the conversion of one million British pounds into Italian lire. The Italian Government is making its acceptance to this conditional on the conversion of 1,100,000 Canadian dollars into Italian lire at the same time.

2. I understand that Mr. Allard has already approached Mr. Pollock and Mr. Bryce of your Department on this matter and has stressed that the I.R.O. considers Canada's agreement to the conversion of Canadian dollars into Italian lire of the utmost importance.

3. I would think that the importance which I.R.O. attaches to this cannot be entirely disregarded. According to our records Mr. Kingsley was told last July by officials of your Department with whom he discussed possible methods of using Canadian dollars, that the Canadian Government would consider conversion of part of the Canadian contribution into French francs and Italian lire. Mr. Kingsley went away with the impression that we would be inclined to consider favourably any such request. This is the first request of this nature which the I.R.O. has made since Kingsley's visit.

4. You will also recall that when Sir Arthur Rucker was in Ottawa last February, we suggested to him that one of the ways which I.R.O. should explore, of using Canadian dollars, was their possible use for the procurement of certain other currencies, such as Italian lire. In Mr. Perry's letter of February 24 to Mr. Heeney concerning instructions for the Canadian Delegation to the last session of I.R.O., he agreed with the suggestion that "emphasis should be placed on I.R.O. trying to utilize its Canadian dollars in making payments to those countries which are relatively short of Canadian funds, — in which the Canadian dollar is a "hard currency".

5. I would hope that in this instance a favourable reply might be made to I.R.O. if at all possible. I believe that it is in our interest to help the I.R.O. dispose of its Canadian dollars in as satisfactory a way as is possible. I realize, of course, that other considerations enter into this matter and that the approval of the Foreign Exchange Control Board must be obtained.

6. I should be grateful to hear from you in regard to this matter at your early convenience.

Le sous-ministre adjoint des Finances

Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, September 20, 1950

Dear Sir,

As you know, this Department agreed, on Monday, September 18th, to satisfy the request of the International Refugee Organization for conversion into Italian lire of $1,100,000 (Canadian) from their account in Canada, on the understanding that no further conversion into any foreign currency would be made until the whole question of the expenditure of the Canadian contribution to the Organization had been fully explored. In order to facilitate the authorized transfer, arrangements are also being made between our two departments for immediate release of the Canadian contribution for 1950-51.

You will recall that the Minister of Finance advised some months ago that no part of the 1950-51 Canadian contribution would be paid in United States dollars, and that the whole of it would be made in Canadian funds. However, as a result of discussions held in July between Mr. D. Kingsley, Director of IRO, and Canadian officials, it was agreed that sympathetic consideration would be given to conversion of IRO funds in Canada into French francs or Italian lire. The authorized conversion of $1,100,000 into Italian lire must, therefore, be regarded primarily as discharging the promise made to Mr. Kingsley, and not as creating any precedent for action in considering similar requests in the future.

We continue to feel strongly that the Organization has failed so far to present a really convincing case showing that it is unable to use Canadian dollars to meet its requirements. In these circumstances, further conversion will not be permitted until the whole situation has been thoroughly re-examined with IRO. I have informed Mr. Allard, IRO representative in Canada, accordingly.

Yours truly,

R.B. BRYCE

Note de la Direction des Nations Unies pour le chef de la Direction des Nations Unies

Memorandum from United Nations Division to Head, United Nations Division

[Ottawa], September 29, 1950

Mr. Ford and I saw Hector Allard of the I.R.O. on Thursday afternoon, September 28. For the sake of convenience I shall outline below under three main headings what we talked about:

1. Mr. Bryce's suggestion that we might ask I.R.O. to lend us $1,000,000 (Canadian) to be used for the purchase of barley for Korea

Mr. Allard gave it as his personal opinion that the I.R.O. might agree to making us a loan in this amount for the purpose indicated. It was pointed out that the I.R.O. had in the past entered into separate agreements with governments. The agreement with the Netherlands Government to transport Dutch troops from Indonesia to Holland was mentioned. Also the agreement with the U.S. Government to transport Volksdeutsche refugees to the U.S. on a reimbursable basis was mentioned. Mr. Allard said that of course he would have to refer any such proposal to the Director-General in Geneva. We asked Mr. Allard not to do so until he had heard further from us.

2. Hard core cases

It became evident that there had been a misunderstanding as to who should do what next after the July meeting when Mr. Kingsley was present. Mr. Allard had been under the impression that the question of admitting T.B. cases was a "dead duck" because of the necessity to amend Canadian immigration legislation. Consequently he had not followed this matter up with the Provinces. He said that he thought that it would be essential for the Canadian Government to at least agree in principle to amend its legislation so as to admit T.B. cases before the Provincial authorities could be approached with any concrete plan. Armed with this assurance Mr. Allard seemed prepared to approach some of the Provincial authorities, although he seemed to think that it might be advantageous to have an initial approach made by some Federal Department such as National Health and Welfare. We told Mr. Allard that Mr. Fortier had been under the impression that he (Allard) was making a survey of the possible facilities in the Provinces. Allard said he had been talking to Fortier a few days ago, and had told him what he had told us. Quite obviously there has been a misunderstanding, and much time has been lost as a result. We told Allard that we had suggested to Mr. Fortier that he call an inter-Departmental meeting to discuss hard cores in the near future. We said that it would be valuable to have Allard present at that meeting, and he said that he would like to attend.

As Allard will be leaving Ottawa for several days on Saturday, October 7, you might wish to phone Mr. Fortier and to suggest that he call an inter-Departmental meeting before that date. Allard might then be able to take advantage of his trip out west to speak to some of the Provincial authorities, in a preliminary manner about the possibility of receiving hard cores.

3. Use of the remaining Canadian dollars by I.R.O.

We told Mr. Allard, what he already knew, namely, that the Department of Finance, and in particular its Deputy Minister was not satisfied that the I.R.O. had done everything it could to try and use Canadian dollars in Canada. Allard agreed that there was probably much truth to this in the past, although he thought that the Canadian authorities were partly to blame in that they did not make an all out effort in the earlier days of the organization to try and sell Canadian goods. Further, Allard thought that the things on which the I.R.O. is spending its money to-day are not those which the Canadian Government has to offer. He pointed out that most of the "care and maintenance" had been turned over to local authorities, and that consequently consumer goods were not being purchased in any quantity at this time.

We suggested to Allard that he might wish to prepare a paper giving some facts and figures to show that it was not possible for I.R.O. to spend Canadian dollars at the present time. Allard, however, did not take up this suggestion, but suggested instead that all pertinent documents could be obtained more readily from Geneva. We did not pursue this further because, frankly, I do not know whether such a paper would be very useful. All I.R.O. documents will, of course, be referred to the Department of Finance. In any event Allard pointed out that when he was here in July, Mr. Kingsley could have given any information of this type which the Department of Finance wanted, and in fact, he had explained the situation to officials of the Department of Finance. However, unfortunately (and, implied Allard, deliberately) the Deputy Minister of Finance was not present at these talks.[4]

Furthermore, it was agreed that if the Government would agree to admit a substantial number of hard cores, and if facilities could be found in the Provinces to accommodate these cases, the I.R.O. might agree to spend most of its remaining Canadian dollars on this project. Thus, there would no longer be any problem.

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 226-50 [Ottawa], September 27, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE EIGHTH SESSION OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE AND THE SIXTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL COUNCIL OF THE INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION

The principal subjects on which the I.R.O. will take decisions at its forthcoming meetings in October, and suggested recommendations, are as follows:

Extension of I.R.O.'s Activities

1. The Director-General will urge the General Council to reconsider the termination date of March 31, 1951, and to permit the Organization to continue operations until it has completed its task, exhausted its funds, or both. The resettlement programme of I.R.O. has been delayed considerably because of the long delay in the adoption of the United States Displaced Persons' Act and the resulting decline in movements to the United States. This Act has now been approved and arrangements are already under way for the movement of large numbers of refugees to the United States. However, it will take approximately another twelve months for all accepted refugees to be moved to the United States. Contributing reasons for the delay in resettling refugees are the diversion of shipping to Korea, reception difficulties in Australia and increasing difficulties in resettling the more difficult categories of refugees. The Director-General states that no additional contributions will be required from member governments as the additional period of operations will be financed from the Organization's present resources.

2. It is recommended that the Canadian delegation support the extension of I.R.O.'s activities for a reasonable period of time provided the Director-General gives reasonable assurances that he will wind up the activities of the Organization as rapidly and effectively as possible and provided no additional contributions are required from member governments.

Refugees from "Iron Curtain" Countries

3. The Director-General has already approached member governments with the suggestion that the Organization extend its mandate to include those refugees who have entered Western Europe after the cut-off dates of August 31, 1949, and October 15, 1949, which the General Council had previously established. Most of these refugees have escaped from the so-called "Iron Curtain" countries. The Director-General estimates that approximately 30,000 of them will be found to meet selection criteria. He suggests that the General Council set the date of its meeting as the new cut-off date for the inclusion of this new group of refugees under the mandate of the Organization for full resettlement services. Mr. Kingsley's suggestion is that 'care and maintenance' be not provided for these additional refugees. Further, he gives it as his considered judgment that the admission of an additional 30,000 refugees to full resettlement services would not exceed the financial resources of the Organization nor impair the resettlement opportunities of those refugees currently classified as resettleable.

4. It is recommended that the Canadian delegation support the proposal to extend full resettlement services, but not 'care and maintenance', to those refugees who would normally be eligible if previous cut-off dates had not been established, provided that no additional contributions will be required from member governments. The new cut-off date should, if possible, be the date of the meeting of the General Council of I.R.O.

5. In general, it is recommended that the Canadian delegation stress the importance of I.R.O. winding up its operations as expeditiously as possible, consistent with the achievement of the purposes and principles for which the Organization was established.[5]

414. DEA/5475-T-40

Note du chef de la Direction des Nations Unies pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Head, United Nations Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, October 12, 1950

One of the most difficult problems which is at present facing the International Refugee Organization is that of resettling those persons who constitute the so-called "Institutional Hard Core". Many Governments have generously admitted large numbers of this group of persons, some of them blind, some of them without one or more limbs, some of them tubercular, and others condemned to pass the rest of their lives in institutions because of their age or because of other physical or mental infirmities.

2. When Mr. Kingsley, the Director-General of I.R.O., was in Ottawa in July, he suggested that Canada might agree to admitting, say, 1,000 T.B. cases on the condition that the I.R.O. would make a per capita payment to cover at least part of the cost of resettling these unfortunate persons in Canada. He realized that before it would be possible to admit these hard-core cases to Canada, detailed arrangements would have to be worked out with the Federal Government, possibly with Provincial Governments as well and with private institutions. However, at that time he was anxious to obtain the approval of the Federal authorities in principle to this suggestion before going ahead with the detailed arrangements. As you know, a meeting was held which representatives from Citizenship and Immigration, Health and Welfare, Finance, and External Affairs attended. Apparently no decision was reached at that time. Officials from the Department of Finance had further talks with Kingsley about the alternative means of using I.R.O. surplus Canadian dollars such as converting them into French francs and Italian lire. On this point, apparently, attention was diverted from the original I.R.O. proposal that Canada admit T.B. cases.

3. With the possible exception of ten blind persons, Canada has not yet agreed to admit any hard-core cases as such, although it is true that the Canadian immigration regulations have been very generously interpreted in respect to "near relatives". Many persons who would otherwise have been classified in the hard-core group have been admitted to Canada because they were dependents of immigrants who were already here. Many other countries have done much more. Norway has admitted and is providing institutional care for 50 blind refugees with their 50 dependents. In addition, Norway is planning to take some 200 additional cases of this type. Israel has agreed to provide facilities for the care of 1600 persons in need of institutional care plus their family members, totalling some 3,000 persons in all. France and Denmark have agreed to care for all of the hard-core cases remaining in their countries. Sweden has agreed to accept 150 pulmonary T.B. cases, together with 150 dependents. In the Netherlands, homes were offered for 200 aged persons by Catholic and Protestant Churches. Belgium will possibly admit over 200 aged refugees and, in addition, will admit 24 mentally deficient children. Other countries, including Ireland are doing their part. Finally, the United States has recently agreed to admit more than 1,100 handicapped refugees, mostly those who are incapacitated through loss of limbs, and it is expected that a few hundred more will be admitted soon. Resettlement is being arranged by Catholic, Lutheran and Jewish agencies and the I.R.O. is making a substantial grant of funds.

4. Undoubtedly, there will be increased pressure on Canada to help solve this extremely vexing refugee problem. The problem will probably at least be discussed at the I.R.O. meetings at present taking place in Geneva, and the Assembly, as you know, has a separate item on its agenda concerning assistance to refugees. Because of a misunderstanding, no active consideration has been given to Mr. Kingsley's suggestion since last July. I have been talking to Mr. Fortier, the Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, about this problem, and he told me that he had been under the impression that Mr. Allard, the I.R.O. representative in Canada, was to approach Provincial authorities and institutions, and find out whether facilities could be provided if the Canadian Government decided to admit T.B. cases. On the other hand, Allard has told me that he had been under the impression that it had been decided to do nothing further about T.B. cases because the Canadian Immigration laws would not permit their entry to this country.

5. I made an effort to settle this question by writing to the Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on September 13. A copy of my letter is enclosed.† My purpose in writing to Mr. Fortier was to have him call an interdepartmental meeting at which all of us could express our views and try to arrive at some conclusions which might be put in the form of recommendations to our Ministers. Mr. Fortier phoned me about this letter and said that both he and his Minister thought that the Federal Government should take no initiative in this matter at this time. Mr. Fortier said that in their view, the I.R.O. should take the primary responsibility in sounding out the Provinces. If the I.R.O. produced a plan after finding out that reception facilities were available in existing institutions, then Citizenship and Immigration would be prepared to consider it on its merits.

6. We are now faced with an impasse. Citizenship and Immigration will take no steps, and Allard will not approach the provinces without some kind of Federal sanction. It seems to us that there is some responsibility on the Federal authorities to take an initiative by defining a policy. Then we might call on the local office of the I.R.O. or anyone else to help us find facilities which might be used for this purpose. National Health and Welfare undoubtedly would be able to give us much assistance in this regard, and some approach might have to be made to the Provincial authorities. The General Assembly, and ECOSOC, and I.R.O. have all passed resolutions from time to time urging Member Governments to do everything they could to help solve the refugee problem. The onus, therefore, is on the Canadian Government, and not on the Secretariat of the I.R.O. although it would probably be advisable later to have Mr. Allard undertake the detailed negotiations.

7. I have, therefore, drafted a letter for your signature, if you agree, asking the Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration once again to call an interdepartmental meeting. You might at the same time consider telephoning Mr. Fortier if you think that this would be wise. A letter along the same lines to Dr. Cameron is also attached for your signature.†

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le sous-ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration

Ottawa, October 12, 1950

I should like to refer to my letter of September 13,† suggesting that an interdepartmental meeting might be called soon to discuss the question of Canada agreeing to admit some of I.R.O.'s so-called "institutional hard-core" cases.

2. What we had in mind was a meeting at which representatives of our two Departments as well as of the Departments of Finance and National Health and Welfare could discuss the pros and cons of Canada's agreeing to admit some institutional refugees and, possibly, agreeing on some form of recommendation which might be put before our respective Ministers. I think that such a meeting would be useful, as there is some obligation on the Canadian Government to try and do something for these unfortunate refugees who constitute the most serious problem confronting the I.R.O. in its final stage of operations. You will recall that among the more recent resolutions adopted by the United Nations on the subject of refugees, the Economic and Social Council at its last session addressed an appeal "to the goodwill of Governments, asking them to assist the Organization in achieving its task by the adoption of the broadest possible criteria for the admission of refugees." At its fourth session the General Assembly urgently appealed to all States "to furnish to the International Refugee Organization the widest possible assistance, particularly in respect of the admission and care of refugees in the most destitute categories". The "Problems of Assistance to Refugees" is one of the subjects to be discussed at the present session of the General Assembly.

3. The General Council of I.R.O., which is meeting next week in Geneva, will have before it the reports of the Director-General who states that an ultimate solution of the 'hard-core' problem "will call for doubled and redoubled efforts on the part of all interested Governments, voluntary organizations and individuals". As you know, several governments have already agreed to admit institutional cases. These include Norway, Israel, Sweden, the Netherlands, Belgium and France. In addition, the United States has recently agreed to admit 1,100 handicapped refugees, satisfactory arrangements having been made with Catholic, Jewish and Lutheran agencies for their resettlement. The I.R.O., for its part, approved a grant of $580,000 to be divided among three religious organizations there. It is, of course, true that the Canadian immigration regulations have been very generously interpreted in respect to the admission of "near relatives" many of whom would otherwise have been classified as hard-core cases.

4. A further consideration is that the Department of Finance and this Department are anxious to assist the I.R.O. in finding a way of spending its Canadian dollar credit which amounts to nearly $4,000,000. If a satisfactory arrangement could be made for the reception of even a few hundred institutional cases in Canada, one might expect that the I.R.O. would be willing to make a sizeable grant from its Canadian dollar surplus.

5. I realize, of course, the difficulties which present themselves when a matter of this nature confronts us. Our immigration laws would probably have to be amended. Detailed and difficult negotiations would have to be undertaken with the provincial authorities or private institutions, or both. Undoubtedly the Administration of the I.R.O. could assist us considerably in undertaking these negotiations, but some lead should first be given by the Federal Government. Consequently, I think that it would be useful to have a meeting and thus to make a further effort to see what might be done.

Le sous-ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, October 23, 1950

Dear Mr. Heeney:

I wish to acknowledge your letters of September 13th† and October 16th [12th].

Following reception of your letter of September 13th I discussed, over the telephone, with Mr. Holmes of your Department, the T.B. hard-core cases and I have had interviews with Mr. Allard on the same subject.

You will recall that at the meeting attended by Mr. Kingsley the question of admitting some "institutional hard-core" cases was raised by him, and our Department and the Department of National Health and Welfare agreed to recommend a special legislation for the admission of tuberculosis cases if some provincial authorities agreed to receive and accept the responsibility for their care and maintenance. As you are aware, according to the present legislation, a person suffering from tuberculosis is not admissible under the Immigration Act.

I have often mentioned to Mr. Allard that he should contact the provincial authorities and see if they would agree to accept a certain number of T.B. cases. I told him that upon reception of a draft agreement between I.R.O. and Provincial Governments we would recommend favourable consideration. However, I am not aware that the I.R.O. representative in Canada has been successful in his approach to the Provincial Governments.

Some of the reasons why we do not believe it advisable for the Federal Government to initiate this approach are:

(a) Health problems are under the jurisdiction of the Provincial Governments.

(b) Due to immigration medical requirements hundreds of individuals coming to close relatives have been refused visas.

(c) For a better Federal Provincial relationship it is thought advisable that a movement of this sort be initiated by the Provincial authorities.

In your letter of October 16th you suggest an Inter-Departmental Committee meeting to discuss the I.R.O. hard-core cases. I am calling a meeting of the Interdepartmental Advisory Committee on Immigration on October 31st at 10.30 a.m., and the following departments are being asked to send their representative:

Privy Council,
Department of External Affairs,
Department of Finance,
Department of National Health and Welfare,

Department of Labour.

Yours sincerely,
LAVAL FORTIER

II. INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION; "HARD-CORE" CASES

3. The Chairman reported that the Director General of the International Refugee Organization had suggested that Canada accept 1,000 of the Organization's 4,000 tubercular cases as the Canadian contribution towards the solution of the "hard-core" problem; it being understood that IRO would be prepared to make per capita grant against the cost of such a commitment. Any such grants would be drawn from the Canadian contribution of $4 million to the Organization.

It was noted that the Immigration Act prohibited the admission to Canada of tubercular cases and the Act would, therefore, have to be amended if IRO's suggestion were to be given favourable consideration. Furthermore, health matters were constitutionally under provincial jurisdiction and any tubercular immigrants admitted would normally have to be placed in provincial sanatoria. This would necessitate agreements being entered into between federal and provincial authorities.

It was further pointed out that at the present time there were approximately 350 tubercular relatives of former displaced persons now residing in Canada who had been denied admission to Canada. In addition, close relatives of Canadian citizens had been refused admission to Canada on medical grounds. This should be kept in mind in reaching a decision on IRO's request, since obviously it would be difficult to justify admission of 1,000 tubercular displaced persons while refusing admission to relatives of residents and citizens of Canada.

Latest information available indicated that the International Refugee Organization still had between 8 and 9,000 hard-core cases who required to be suitably placed. This total included, in addition to the 4,000 tubercular cases referred to above, aged persons, mental cases and persons suffering from chronic medical disorders or physical defects.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Citizenship and Immigration, undated, IACI Doc. No. 1)†

4. Colonel Fortier added that, although existing legislation prohibited the granting of permanent landing to incurable tubercular cases, it was possible to grant temporary entry for the purpose of effecting a cure. This has been the practice of the Immigration Branch in exceptional cases warranting consideration on compassionate grounds where arrangements for hospitalization were made and guarantees were submitted that the person coming forward would not become a public charge.

5. The Secretary to the Cabinet suggested that serious consideration should be given to the desirability of amending the Immigration Act in order to permit the permanent landing not only of curable tubercular persons but also of certain incurables who had close relatives in this country, provided certain safeguards were established in order to ensure that financial responsibility for the care of these hard-core cases would be assumed either by the relatives themselves or by certain charitable or religious organizations. It was obvious that any such move would not be of any statistical significance insofar as immigration was concerned but such an amendment seemed desirable nonetheless on purely humanitarian grounds if none other.

Insofar as elderly indigents were concerned, it would seem that this proposal might be carried a step further and certain numbers in this group accepted whether or not they had relatives in Canada, provided that recognized charitable or religious organizations were willing to assume responsibility for the care of these people.

6. The Deputy Minister of Welfare said it was possible that a good number of the remaining 4,000 IRO tubercular cases might be curable if given proper medical attention and it might therefore be possible, even without amending existing legislation, to grant temporary entry to a certain number of curables on the assumption that, when the cure had been effected, consideration could be given to granting permanent landing. The main problem seemed to be the lack of space in provincial tubercular sanatoria. Provincial homes for the aged were also very crowded, although it was possible that certain institutions in the Province of Quebec might be in a position to absorb a limited number of immigrants.

7. The Deputy Minister of Labour said it had been estimated that a tubercular case could be looked after in European institutions for $2 or $3 a day, as opposed to $7 or $9 a day in Canadian institutions. In the circumstances, it might be preferable to make some arrangement whereby Canada would contribute something towards the proper care of these hard-core cases in suitable European sanatoria.

8. The Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the Government might well agree to authorize IRO to use a portion of the $4 million Canadian contribution towards the end suggested by Mr. MacNamara.

9. Mr. Armstrong said that although it was originally intended that the Canadian contribution to IRO should be spent in Canada, consideration had been given in the Department of Finance to the possibility and desirability of authorizing IRO to spend a certain portion of this contribution in countries other than Canada. In this connection Canada also had a certain number of blocked credits in foreign countries but the sums involved were relatively small and did not seem to be a significant factor in solving the hard-core problem.

10. Dr. Davidson pointed out that under the Federal health programme the Government contributed $1,500 per bed to provinces constructing hospitals for the treatment of tubercular diseases. No such Federal contribution was made towards the construction of homes for the aged. In the circumstances, there might be some merit in inquiring whether IRO would be prepared to contribute, say, $1,000 per bed towards the construction of provincial homes for the aged on the understanding that such homes would be required to accept an agreed number of aged displaced persons.

11. Mr. Robertson suggested that this problem could profitably be discussed at the Federal-Provincial Conference of December 4.

12. Colonel Fortier said that, under existing legislation and regulations respecting immigration, availability of employment or support by close relatives were the two yardsticks normally used in ruling on admissibility. It seemed desirable, however, to liberalize somewhat the current basis of admission, and it was therefore suggested that before considering IRO's request for the admission of 1,000 tubercular DP's every effort should be made to permit the landing of the 350 tubercular relatives referred to previously. If this were to be done, it would be desirable to enlist IRO's support and it might also be necessary to make certain amendments to existing legislation and regulations.

Inquiries might also be made as to whether certain religious or charitable institutions would be prepared to assume responsibility for the care of a certain number of aged indigents with possible assistance from IRO.

13. The Committee after considerable further discussion, agreed,

(a) that every effort be made to admit the 350 tubercular relatives of Canadian residents and a certain number of tubercular displaced persons with IRO's assistance and the cooperation of the provincial governments, it being understood that priority should be given to the admission of close relatives;

(b) that the possibility of admitting a certain number of aged indigents under the sponsorship of Canadian religious or charitable organizations and, if possible, with IRO's assistance be explored further; and

(c) that immigration legislation and regulations be reviewed in order to determine what amendments might be required to give effect to the recommendations set forth in (a) and (b).

III. HARD-CORE CASES; IRO PROPOSAL
